The Socialistic Labor party represents reform in its purity. It stands for fraternal coöperation (as against capitalistic warfare), tending toward a condition of society wherein all workers of hand or brain shall be equal partners in the product of the national industrial organization. The final outcome of this condition would be the elevation of the Individual—the first road to take being: "free access to land;" because freedom of the soil brings independence of the laborer, and the full fruits of his labor for himself.

In the city and state of New York there will be a complete (official ballot) Socialistic Labor ticket—also in Massachusetts. It would be inconsistent for a Freethinker to vote for either of the three old parties.

THE TRUTH SEEKER advertises a book on another page entitled, "Looking Backward," by Edward Bellamy. I hav read it and found it an excellent exponent of Socialism; and can heartily commend it to all who like literature that instructs while it enlivens and entertains.

Yours fraternally, E. J. KIMBALL.

Belief, Not Knowledge, Is What Christ and All Christians Want.

BRADFORD, PA., Oct. 11, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The article I wrote for publication in your paper a few issues since caused some little commotion amongst the followers of the lamb in this locality. To some it was a great source of annoyance, and to others it gave a great feeling of relief. The latter was what pleased me the most. To say a few words to the many Liberal thinkers living in this benighted neighborhood is to me a labor willingly performed. To break the iron bars of ignorant superstition; to take by the hand those who hav been imprisoned in those grated cells of bigoted, narrow, soul-shrinking creeds; to lead them into the bright light of a better day, is a labor gratuitously, kindly, gladly performed. I want to see the day that every good man in the right will be every other good man's brother, no matter what is his idea of here or hereafter, mortal or immortal. Beliefs prove nothing. Knowledge, and great knowledge, is all we should hav any entertainment for. It is the only school we want, and it is the school we can afford to contribute to—where our children can learn something useful, where mathematics instead of prayer is taught. The multiplication table in my judgment is far in advance of rosaries. By giving these rising generations an education we enable them in after years to go out into the world with the advantage of a good education and secure employment; and at the same time we will be doing away with a certain amount of superstition. Knowledge is the great enemy of religion. The more of it we can distribute, the more happiness we are inaugurating and the more victims we can hope to force out of the withered grasp of the church. In all ages the church has fought with all her power the science of education, the science of medicin, the science of astronomy—in short, every move that the pioneers of the race of mankind hav ever put on foot for the benefit of the human or animal races. The system by which she creates the alms on which she livs is the result of long-continued and bloody wars of extermination, the cruelty of which there are not words enough in all the languages of men to describe. This system is built on a platform of one single plank, and that plank is belief. To be a member of this institution you are not required to bring anything in the shape of knowledge with you. You must make yourself familiar with the kind of belief that is requisit where you make application for membership. This is all. And we find the man or God-man that organized this society of Christians about eighteen hundred years ago was not in favor of knowledge. This is how we know. It seems that Nicodemus was ruler of the Jews about the time that Christ was organizing his sect. According to the story, Nicodemus came to Christ by night and said to him: "Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher come from God, for no man can do these signs that thou dost, except God be with him." Here is a fair question asked of God. It is contended by the followers that Christ is as much God as God is himself, so virtually Nicodemus was speaking to God. The above and a few following questions put to Christ will giv us some idea of the wisdom of God. "Jesus answered and said unto him, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God. Nicodemus saith unto him, How can a man be born when he is old, can he enter the second time into his mother's womb and be born? Jesus answered, Verily, verily, I say unto thee, except a man be born of water and of the spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. That which is born of the flesh is flesh; and that which is born of the spirit is spirit. Marvel not that I said unto thee, ye must be born again." We ask, must this kind of answer coming from the creator of the universe satisfy modern Infidels? Let us look at the reason given for being born again. Of course, if this kind of reason was given in an asylum we would not at all be amazed, but coming from a heavenly representativ, it is worth our while to make a careful analysis of it. "The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof but knowest not whence it cometh and whither it goeth. So is everyone that is born of the spirit. And Nicodemus said, How can these things be? Jesus answered and said, Art thou the teacher of Israel and understandest not these things?" What satisfaction is here for an honest seeker of the truth? When Jesus was asked these plain, simple questions, and the fact was that he was God, he should hav proved beyond a shadow of doubt that we must be born again. In this question the light that was so much talked of did not seem to cast a ray. In this interview we find one looking for knowledge and the other looking for belief. If God was in possession of the knowledge he would hav undoubtedly illustrated there to Nicodemus the method of being born again. We hav had Christs in all ages of the world, and they all ask the people to believe in them, and in regard to those abstruse questions we find none of them can giv the Infidel any information any more than the original one. But here the question arises, why don't some of these followers do something according to their belief? They should turn water into wine; they should by simple touch bring the dead to life, feed five thousand men on five barley loaves and two fishes. If they could only do this latter one thing, what a vast amount of lives could be saved every year from starvation, from going to poorhouses, from going to brothers to get food and clothing, taking advantage of all opportunities to get enough to keep away the pangs of hunger and despair! Look at the great army of blind and crippled the world over, and they are all believers and according to their belief they should heal themselvs. This belief medicin has been in use for eighteen hundred years and we find that we hav to maintain the hospitals and asylums just the same and employ doctors and physicians to attend to the wants of the cripples and insane. Where has Christ been all these years with his barley loaves and fishes? Why does he allow so many to die of want and go insane yearly when he told them expressly if they followed his example he would do away with their wants? Did he tell the whole truth and nothing but the truth, or has the mind of the great people misunderstood his sanctimonious principle of heavenly lying? There is a deception somewhere, in the author or in the great mind of the followers. We know from the Sunday attendance on pious occasions they are doing all in their power to carry to a successful issue the doctrin as he laid it down. Christ plainly said himself, at St. John xiv: "Verily, verily, I say unto you, he that believeth on me, the works that I do shall he do also and greater works than these shall be do, because I go unto the father." Where is the follower that can do anything according to faith? Let us hav it now and here once for all. Let the church set a day apart and giv us Infidels an invitation and we will try and attend as spectators if they promis us one little miracle. We don't ask much. Nor do we want a large one. Anything will do, no matter how small it is, so they prove to us it is a miracle, or forever hold their peace and disorganize and let us sleep on Sunday morning.

JAS. SPELLEN.

Medical and Theological Doctors Contrasted.

INDIAN GROVE, MO., Sept. 12, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The undersigned has recently been admonished in a very impressiv manner by a dear friend to flee from the "wrath to come." He says: "I am amazed at such a reckless onslaught on the venerated religion of our fathers. It would be far less irrational, and less pernicious in its effects on mankind, to annihilate forever the pharmaceutic department of science and blot out the materia medica of the universe, together with all that experience and observation hav discovered in the practice of medicin, and thus practically abandon the world to the ravages of pestilential disease and death, than to destroy the hope and faith that animates and inspires the great sympathetic heart of the Christian world."

Now, we wish to inform our friend that we do not contemplate undertaking to annihilate the pharmaceutic department of science, or to blot out the materia medica of the universe, or to obstruct or hinder in any way the acquirement of useful knowledge that would be of any practical utility whatever to mankind. No, no! I am sure we cannot dispense with the doctor of physic. It would never do to depend on priestly prayers and holy oil to heal the sick and afflicted. Nevertheless, I would inaugurate a general crusade against all doctors of divinity—divine quacks—and their foul nostrums I would cast into the sea. There is a great multitude of these pampered, sleek-coated spiritual quacks. It is claimed that there are ninety thousand of them in this country alone. But one competent doctor of physic outweighs them all. His service is of more real value during the prevalence of La grippe or small-pox than the entire ninety thousand clerical quacks combined.

Anodynes, anesthetics, holy oil, and invocation of saints are invariably the remedies prescribed by these learned doctors of divinity. They constitute their entire stock in trade. They are regarded as a kind of king cure-all, a sovereign specific, warranted to giv immediate relief in every case. A patient is suddenly aroused to a consciousness of his true condition. He finds his moral constitution a complete wreck. Taking a retrospect of the past, he finds that he has been a fiend incarnate. He has rioted wantonly with the munificent bounties of nature in rich profusion around him. He has been recreant to every sacred trust. He has desecrated the family hearthstone and destroyed the happiness of the domestic circle. He has lured the innocent and confiding from the path of virtue and right. So utterly depraved was he that he could laugh with Satanic glee at the wretchedness and misery he had wrought. But an avenger hath overtaken him at last, and he now finds himself before the inexorable bar of justice, where he has been tried for his life, found guilty, and condemned to die for the many foul and atrocious crimes that he has so unhesitatingly committed. In a wild tremor of excitement he bawls: "O for an anodyne to relieve the excruciating mental anguish that is racking my worn-out frame! Is there no help?" "Why, God bless you, yes," says the spiritual quack; "fear not, my brother, you hav but to knock and the door to happiness and peace is opened for you. It already stands ajar and angels are inviting you to come. 'Tis true you hav been an abandoned, despised wretch. Yes, yes, 'tis true that all earthly friends hav just forsaken you, lest they be contaminated by your foul presence. But there is one friend that loves you. Yes, he does! Bless his holy name! Jesus always loved you! He has long been standing with loving heart and open arms ready and willing at any time to bless and receive you—patiently waiting for you to sow your wild oats expecting that you would come only at the eleventh hour all worn and fagged out and unfit for aught but to repose on his loving breast. [He can hav my place] It is true you hav been one of the vilest of the vile. Divine justice demands that you should roast forever. I am sure there can be no mistake about that. But you hav trusted him; you hear me, you hav trusted him, and praised him a little, and acknowledged him to be a great king, superior to all other kings; you hav chosen him to be your savior, so never fear! Do not trouble yourself about the consequence of your crimes You doubtless hav had a good time. The dead line is now passed in safety, if you only continue to trust him. This is the important point just now. Jesus has paid it all. He has taken your sins upon himself and canceled them in advance by his blood shed on Calvary eighteen hundred years ago that you may escape a just recompense for the conduct of a vicious, immoral, depraved life. As is generally the case, no sorrow nor regrets for sin can hold out successfully against such vigorous treatment. The equilibrium of the patient is miraculously restored, and with his remaining energy he cries, "God bless the blessed anodyne!" while the spiritual quack joins the nurses and numerous attendants in singing, "The great physician now is near," etc.

No one can sin against (injure) the infinit; but we can and do often sin against ourselvs and our fellow-man. But if we go to the one we hav injured and make the wrong right, and mend our ways for time to come, we will hav no use for clerical anodynes, anesthetics, holy oil, invocation of saints, nor anything of the kind, but will liv in peace with ourselvs, our neighbors, and all that surrounds us in life.

I wish to state in this connection that notwithstanding the gravity of the subject under consideration, I am sometimes amused by some of those spiritual nut-crackers. They get tangled on some knotty question and become indignant, and instead of replying to the arguments presented they assail the character of their opponent with personal slang and abuse, and like the well-trained Pretty Pollys that they are, they sit upon their upholstered perch and chirp with a reverential intonation the same old song that King David sang three thousand years ago, "The fool hath said in his heart there is no God!" It has been said that children and fools tell the truth. These spiritual croakers assume an air of sacerdotal gravity and hammer away at these old theological chestnuts, and it is really amusing to see them miss the chestnut and whack their fingers. I am always sorry for them, especially when they happen to crack their heads. This, however, does not often occur, as thick skulls are hard to break.

In conclusion, I wish right here to acknowledge, with thanks, the receipt of the numerous Freethought publications that hav recently come to my address. The futility of undertaking to start and sustain so many new Free thought publications just at this time seems to hav been practically demonstrated. Such undertakings, for the present at least, should and will be abandoned by those who hav a practical conception of the methods requisit to the advancement of the Freethought interests of the day. A generous patronage of the Freethought publications now in print would certainly reduce the subscription price by increasing their circulation, and at the same time place them on a permanent financial basis.

There is one feature in connection with THE TRUTH SEEKER that commends it to our admiration and approval. If you are not in sympathy with its methods and aims you are expected to say so. If you wish to place yourself on record as opposing Anarchy, Socialism, Spiritualism, promiscuity, and superstition in all their varied phases and forms, it is your accredited privilege. And we hope that no one will feel any hesitancy in doing so. The most expeditious method of killing an idea is to giv it enough ventilation through the press. We think, however, that all vicious and immoral practices and theories that are universally reprobated by all civilized people should not be discussed in the public prints. Respectfully, W. E. WALTON.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Prince of Newfoundland.

A TRUE STORY.

The shower had ceased, but the city street
Was flooded still with the drenching rain,
Though men and horses with hurrying feet
Swept on their busy ways again.

The gutter ran like a river deep:
By the clean-washed pavement fast it rushed
As out of the spouts with a dash and a leap
The singing, sparkling water gushed.

A little kitten with ribbon blue
Crossed over the way to the gutter's brink;
With many a wistful, plaintiv mew,
She seemed at the edge to shudder and shrink.

And there she stood, while her pi'eous cries
Were all unheard by the heedless throng,
Looking across with such longing eyes;
But the torrent was all too swift and strong.

Up the street, o'er the pavement wide,
Wandered our Prince from Newfoundland,
Stately and careless and dignified,
Gazing about him on either hand.

The sun shone out on his glossy coat,
And his beautiful eyes so soft and brown
With quiet, observant glance took note
Of all that was passing him, up and down.

He heard the kitten that wailed and mewed,
Stopped to look and investigate,
The whole situation understood,
And went at once to the rescue straight.

Calmly out into the street walked he
Up to the poor little trembling waif,
Lifted her gently and carefully,
And carried her over the water safe,

And set her down on the longed-for shore,
Licked her soft coat with a kind caress,
Left her and went on his way once more,
The picture of noble thoughtfulness.

Only a dog and a cat, you say?
Could a human being understand
And be more kind in a human way
Than this fine old Prince from Newfoundland?

Oh, children dear, 'tis a lesson sweet;
If a dumb dog so wise can be,
We should be gentle enough to treat
All creatures with kindness and courtesy.

For surely among us there is not one
Who such an example could withstand;
Who would wish in goodness to be outdone
By a princely dog from Newfoundland?

Biographical Sketches.

VII.—BYRON.

George Gordon, Lord Byron, was born on Holles street, London, the 22d day of January, 1788. His father was captain of a ship and a dashing and extravagant man. Miss Catherine Gordon, Lord Byron's mother, was Captain Byron's second wife. She was an only child of indulgent parents. Perhaps that accounts for her disposition, for she was a passionate and revengeful woman. A fortune held in her own right Captain Byron soon squandered, and then left her with only a few pounds which he could not touch. And this was all that was left at the time that the p'et was born. Captain Byron died in Valenciennes, 1791, mourned by few. Mrs. Byron, or Mrs. Gordon, as she now called herself, was passionately attached to her son, alternately smothering him with kisses or enraging him with blows. Byron's unhappy disposition was probably inherited from his mother. He would hav fits of violent, passionate outbursts and tear his little dresses into ribbons, defying his mother and nurse to do their worst—"silent rages," as he afterward called them. In "Don Juan" he says:

A little curly-headed, good-for-nothing,
And mischief-making monkey from his birth,
His parents ne'er agreed except on doting
Upon the most unquiet imp on earth;
Instead of quarreling, if they had both been in
Their senses, they'd hav sent the young master forth
To school, or had him soundly whipped at home,
To teach him manners for the time to come.

This was no doubt founded on fact.

Like Burns, Byron was "constantly a victim of love." Indeed, the two poets greatly resembled one another in almost everything, save that Byron had more of a superior education and was hence more refined and cultured. Byron "had sighed to many," indeed. When only a little fellow of eight he fell in love, and was afterward noted for his many attachments. He was created a lord at the age of eleven, having succeeded his grand-uncle, a moody old gentleman who shut himself up in his castle after killing his friend in a duel or drunken quarrel—people are disputing which it was, but I feel more inclined to agree with the latter. Little Lord Byron bore his new honors meekly, but with dignity. He is reported to hav asked his mother one day during a conversation in which Mrs. Byron, or Mrs. Gordon, was probably trying to impress upon Byron his great responsibility, if "she perceived any difference in him since he became a lord, since he perceived none himself."

Byron had his faults, but he was nobly sympathetic and scorned to stoop to a mean action—a hater of sham and hypocrisy. A little incident which is reported to hav occurred at school is worth recording to illustrate the noble quality of sympathy. A very rough and large boy one day was inflicting a very painful punishment upon a little boy with a heavy stick, which left large crimson streaks from which the blood oozed out. Byron was a witness of the chastisement, and his little heart ached for the child, but he knew that he was powerless to do anything; so, stepping up to the tormentor, he asked, in a voice quivering with passion and resentment, how many stripes he intended to inflict. "Why," the large boy returned, "you little rascal, what is that to you?" "Because," answered the little hero, holding out his arm, "I would take half."

Byron's first literary venture was in 1806, which he wrote while at college. It was a small quarto volume, which is, however, out of print. The following year he wrote "Hours of Idleness," which critics declared to hav hardly possessed literary merit. They were fiercely assailed by Lord (then Mr.) Brougham in the Edinburgh Review. His sarcasms stung Byron into a poet, for he then wrote "English Bards and Scotch Reviewers," which the public had to acknowledge, and then Byron started on the road to fame. He grew dissipated, like Burns, and, thinking that marriage would settle him down, he married Miss Milbank, daughter of Sir Ralph Milbank. But this marriage proved strangely infelicitous, and after the birth of her daughter Ada, Lady Byron left for her maiden home and refused to come back. Byron then left England. In a letter to a friend he writes: "I was accused of every monstrous vice by public rumor and private rancor. . . . I felt that if what was whispered and muttered and murmured was true, I was unfit for England; if false, England was unfit for me. I withdrew." His fondness for the water, and the expectation of being free once more, is expressed in the third canto of "Childe Harold:"

Once more upon the waters, yet once more.

And farther on, his yearning to behold his child once more:

To aid thy mind's development—to watch
Thy dawn of little joys—to sit and see
Almost thy very growth—to view thee catch
Knowledge of objects, wonders yet to thee!
To hold thee lightly on a gentle knee,
And print on thy soft cheek a parent's kiss—

And again—

Is thy face like thy mother's, my fair child?
Ada! sole daughter of my house and heart!
When last I saw thy young blue eyes, they smiled,
And then we parted—not as now we part,
But with a hope——

Byron's career ended on the 19th of April, 1824. He was overtaken by a shower while on horseback; fever set in, which finished his life and ended his troubles. He was rather handsome, with curly hair and regular features. His only defect was in his right foot, which was deformed.

IDA A. BALLOU.

A Slight Mistake.

A very long time ago, when I wore pants with only one leg—you see the idea of having had to wear dresses is still strongly distasteful, and now, as I did in early boyhood, it comes easier to say pants withone leg—once, when conversation referred to a neighbor who was the stepfather of a young lad working at my father's whose name was George, the gentleman appeared at the gate, and when he knocked upon the door I ran to open and admit him, and after he greeted me I ran to announce him in the sitting-room, and this is what I said: "O papa! George's foot father is come," and I never heard the last of this mistake.

UNCLE JACK.

Correspondence.

CISNE, ILL., Oct. 4, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first letter to the Corner, although I hav thought I would write for some time past.

I am the sister of Elmer W. Pride. He and Willie hav written several times.

We liv on a farm, and I am the only sister of six boys, so of course I do not hav much time to read or write as I would like, and we are building this fall, besides. I like THE TRUTH SEEKER very much, and the Magazine just as well.

I want to tell you about one of our Christian friends here. She has a very sick sister. The sick girl is married and is not able to hire a girl to help her, and her mother has been trying to wait on her and her own family at the same time, so she thought it would be better to bring her home. But her good Christian sister says she does not want her there; she is only in the way. Does she not show her Christian spirit to her own sister?

There are not many Liberals very near us.

Well, I guess my letter is long enough for the first. I will try and write more next time. Hoping to see this in print,

Your sincere friend,
GRACIE PRIDE.

MCMINNVILLE, ORE., Sept. 23, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I think it is about time for me to write to the Corner again.

School will start next Monday and I am glad of it.

We are having just lovely weather now, but it rained for two weeks before.

I received a Freethinkers' Magazine. There is a lady's picture in it and I think it is Susan H. Wixon's. I was glad to get the Magazine and I think it is very nice.

We are going to build a new house this fall. We shall commence it in a few weeks.

I will be glad when the flowers commence blooming again. I am fond of flowers.

I am much disappointed when there is no Corner in the paper. The last paper had no Corner. I was very sorry. I think some of the children's letters are just splendid.

I would like to hav some of the boys and girls write to me. We are all Freethinkers. There are not many Freethinkers around here. Some of the boys and girls are Liberal in their views. I would like some time to hav you send me one of your pictures if you would, and I may send one of mine some day.

My sister said she would not write this time, as she has no time to write.

I like to liv here. We hav a nice climate here, although there is a good deal of snow and rain during the winter months.

Well, I will close, for fear of that dreadful waste-basket. Hoping I shall see this in print, I am, as ever,

Your friend, VINA FARMER.

Friend Craddock,
Will thee please send me four bottles of Cannabis Indica, Pills and Ointment for my cousin's husband, whom I fear is in a decline, and as thy medicines cured my only brother of a Hemorrhage of the Lungs about a year ago, I wish cousin to take them.
Thy true friend, HANNAH MICKLE.
Near Woodbury, N. J.

"Mother has been suffering with Bronchitis nearly twenty years, and tried most all kinds of medicine, and says the Cannabis Indica is the only thing that gives her relief."
JANE A. ASHBROOK,
Lovelaceville, Ballard Co., Ky.

"I know all about the Cannabis Indica. Fifteen years ago it cured my daughter of the Asthma; she had it very bad for several years, but was perfectly cured. Please send me a $9 box of your medicine." JACOB TROUT, Deep River, Poweshick Co., Iowa.

"I have taken the Cannabis Indica as directed, and am happy to tell you that I am perfectly cured of Nasal Catarrh. You were right, my trouble was not Consumption, but Catarrh."
JAMES A. CALDWELL,
Wabash Ave., Chicago, Ill.

Gentlemen: Please find enclosed $30 for another box of medicine; your remedies are doing a great good in this neighborhood. The Salve and Pills are gaining great reputation in curing Rheumatism and Constipation; if you send me some circulars I will distribute them. You really ought to have an agency out here.
Respectfully, C. M. MEEK, Postmaster.

With the exact knowledge which the Physicians of to-day have, diagnosing is no longer guess work; the poison, the acid, the germ, or the cause itself may be clearly traced, and the physician at once determine his course. Therefore the public has a guarantee that Dr. H. James' preparations of Hemp are based upon strictly scientific principles, with a thorough knowledge of the effects of each ingredient separately and combined, upon each organ of the human system, in either its healthy or its diseased condition. Hence the universal satisfaction of this remedy.

Since the introduction of Dr. H. James' preparations into this country the demand for them has become so great that we are obliged to establish agencies in various localities for the accommodation of our patients. In future this remedy can be obtained at the following agencies, or at the Home office:

ADDRESS THE TRUTH SEEKER OFFICE.

A Truth Seeker Around the World. Four large volumes. With a steel-plate engraving of the author in Vol. I., and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts. Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers. 1,075 pages, 8vo. Cloth, $3.00; leather, $4.00; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Champions of the Church; Their Crimes and Persecutions. 8vo. 1,119 pages. Cloth, $3.00; leather, $4.00; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times. Two Volumes. Written in prison. In cloth, $3.00 per volume, or $5.00 for the two volumes; in leather, $7.00; in morocco, gilt edges, $8.00.

From Behind the Bars. A series of letters written in prison. Over 700 pages. Price $1.50.

A Truth Seeker in Europe. A series of letters written during a visit of ten weeks in Europe. Giving some account of the International Freethinkers' Congress held at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was a delegate, followed by a description of what he saw in England, France, Holland, and Italy. The letters from Rome alone are worth the price of the book. With a steel-plate portrait of the author. 850 pages. $1.50.

The Semitic Gods and the Bible. Treating upon the gods of the Semitic nations, including Allah, Jehovah, Satan, the Holy Ghost, Jesus Christ, the Virgin Mary, and the Bible. To the latter 230 pages are devoted, showing that book to be a very inferior production for a first-class God. 333 large pages. Paper covers, 60 cents; cloth, $1.

Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism examined historically and critically. It is thought to be the most damaging exhibit of Christianity that has appeared. 500 large pages. Price, $1.50.

Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories, Essays, and Lectures. 700 pages. Paper covers, 75 cents;

The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion. A debate on Christianity and Infidelity, between D. M. BENNETT and Rev. G. H. HUMPHREY. This book has had a very large sale, and is a splendid work for Freethinkers to loan to Christian neighbors. 550 pages. Price, $1.

THE TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL Price, 25 Cents

Bennett-Teed Discussion. Between D. M. BENNETT and CYRUS ROMULUS R. TEED. Jesus the Lord God Creator of Heaven and Earth. Paper, 30 cents;

What Objections to Christianity? A discussion between D. M. BENNETT and G. M. MAIR, divided into the following theses: 1. Christianity is neither new nor original, being borrowed or copied from much older systems of religion.

2. Miracles and supernatural achievements hav been as fully and truly ascribed to other teachers and founders of religion as to Jesus.

3. The story of Jesus and his mission in the world is unhistorical; it is not corroborated by contemporaneous history.

BENNETT affirms; MAIR denies. This is an exhaustiv discussion. Price, $1.50.

Trial of D. M. Bennett in the United States Circuit Court upon the charge of depositing prohibited matter in the mail. This gives a full history of this celebrated case, and shows what monstrous injustice was perpetrated upon MR. BENNETT. Price, cloth, 75 cents; paper, 50 cents.

An Open Letter to Jesus Christ. 5 cents.

Interrogatories to Jehovah. Being 3,000 questions propounded to his Jewish Godship upon a great variety of subjects. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Deacon Skidmore's Letters. First Deacon of Zion Hill Baptist Church, giving many church incidents and his evolution from Christianity to Liberalism. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

News of the Week.

GEORGE KENNAN, the famed Russian traveler, says: "The czar of Russia is a well-meaning man, but his judgment is bad, having been narrowed by his advisers. He believes that he is divinely appointed to persecute the Hebrews for having crucified the savior, and that he is only fulfilling the commands in the scripture by so doing."

PILGRIMS to the Holy Coat numbered 1,925,130.

WHETHER our representativs in Russia should remonstrate against the Jewish persecution is debated.

MANY big Russian firms failed last week, owing to trade demoralization caused by expulsion of the Jews.

WALT WHITMAN'S paralysis is approaching his heart, and though he may liv for years he may die at any moment.

IN China the Kola Hui secret society has placarded the walls of Wuchang with announcements that all missionaries will be exterminated.

IN Mexico, where at present it is impossible to get a divorce under any circumstances, Juan Mateos has introduced a divorce bill in the house of deputies, which is strongly opposed by the Catholic church.

LILY O'KEEFE, a Catholic girl of New York, quarreled in a religious discussion with her Episcopal friend Florence Elliott, and a few days afterward volunteered to prepare a meal for her, into which she introduced poison. The food was taken by three persons, one of whom may die.

A FEW provinces of the Catholic church ask that the canonization of Torquemada, ratified by Pius IX. fifteen years ago, be revoked, as the saintship of such a man disgraces the church.

THE Rev. D. S. Phelan, editor of the Western Watchman, who keeps up a correspondence with Rome, says: "There is no telling at what instant the mob may storm the Vatican, assassinate the pope, and desecrate the papacy's possessions."

WINTER began in Russia on the 22d with the first sharp frost. There are literally millions of human beings to whom this frost comes as a sentence of death by starvation. Although the censors hav forbidden the Russian papers to discuss the famin, the Novosti ventures the declaration that 20,000,000 creatures are already without food.

THE pope, in a note to the powers, says that the recent Pantheon disorders were of extreme importance, and insists that it is impossible for both the Italian government and the papacy to remain in Rome. These manifestations, he says, prove the Italian government's intention to sequestrate the pope in the Vatican and not allow him free communication with the Catholic world.

CATHOLICS continue to bluster against Italy's possible appropriation of the Vatican if a non-Italian is elected pope. "Whether it be an Italian," they say, "or a Frenchman or an American on whom the Sacred College chooses to confer the sublimest dignity under the sun, the Vatican property will be alike secure against the robbers of the Quirinal, and for a reason which may be summed up in one word—fear."

THE Ecumenical Methodist conference at Washington closed on the 20th. Bishop Keener said: "Go home; get rid of this doctrin of evolution that puts a bomb at the bottom of the Pentateuch and Moses that will blow you up if you don't get rid of it. If you can't get rid of the doctrin get rid of the men and the institutions that teach it, no matter how dear they are to you. They will blow you up if you don't."

PERE HYACINTHE, the Catholic dignitary of Paris whose radical utterances hav almost severed him from his church, on the 25th condemned superstitious abuses, such as the Lourdes vision and the Treves coat. He made a vehement attack on the pope's temporal power agitation as inconsistent with his priestly office. He said he honored Pope Leo for his exemplary virtues and courage, but not as a pretender to the possession of Italian soil and to the right to enjoy exceptional laws which would recognize him as an earthly potentate. Leo was too vigorous a diplomatist, who would do wisely to heed the will of the Italian people and submit to the country's laws.

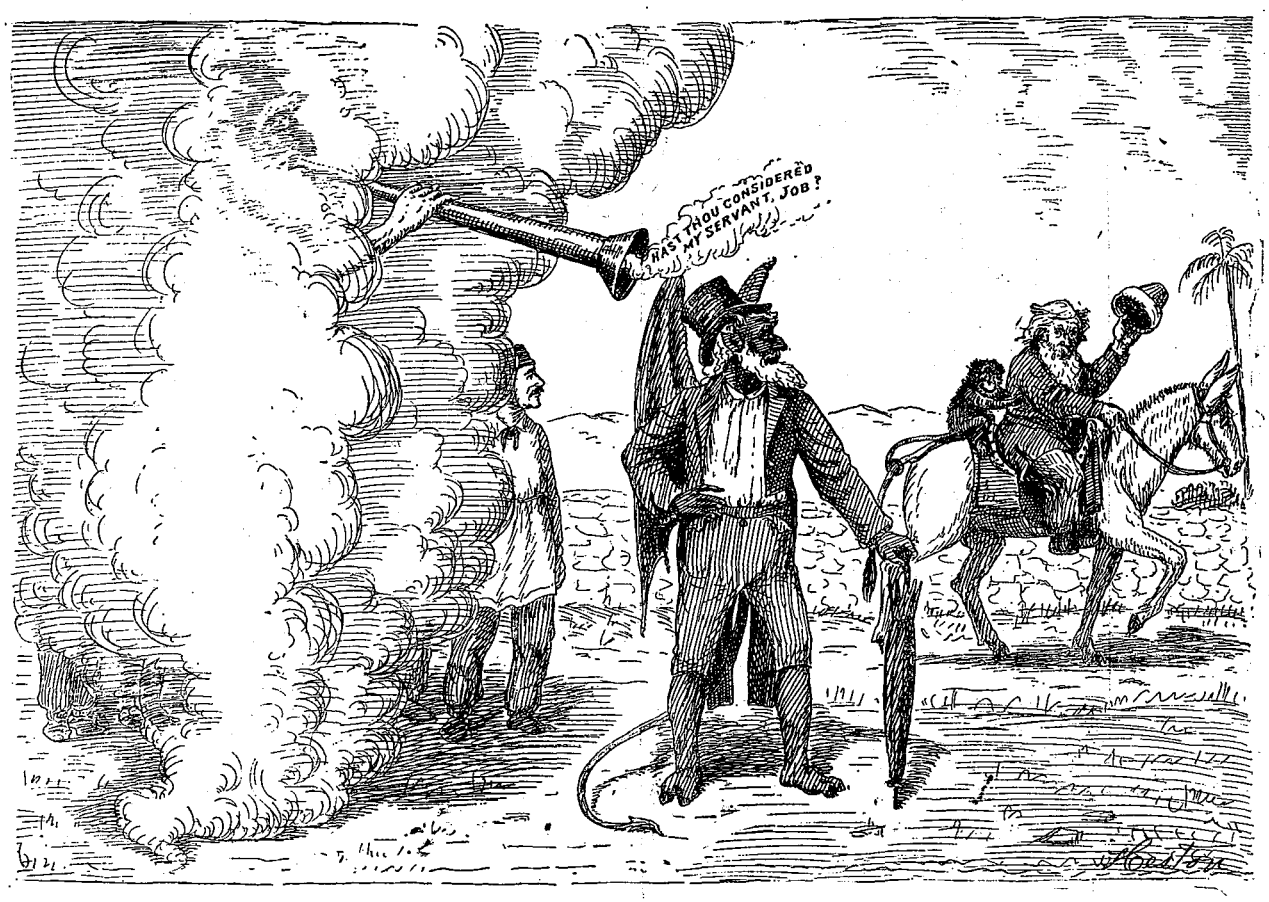
THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

Gems of Thought.



To pretend that God can be offended at the actions of men is to annihilate all the ideas which divines endeavor to giv us, in other respects, of this being. To say that man can trouble the order of the universe; that he can kindle the thunder in the hand of his God; that he can defeat his projects, is to say, that man is stronger than his God, that he is the arbiter of his will, that it depends upon him to change his goodness into cruelty. Theology continually pulls down, with one hand, what it erects with the other. If all religion is founded upon a God who is provoked and appeased, all religion is founded on a palpable contradiction.—D'Holbach.

IF the Pentateuch is not inspired in its astronomy, geology, geography, history, or philosophy, if it is not inspired concerning slavery, polygamy, war, law, religious or political liberty, or the rights of men, women and children, what is it inspired in, or about? The unity of God?—that was believed long before Moses was born. Special providence?—that has been the doctrin of ignorance in all ages. The rights of property?—theft was always a crime. The sacrifice of animals?—that was a custom thousands of years before a Jew existed. The sacredness of life?—there hav always been laws against murder. The wickedness of perjury:—truthfulness has always been a virtue. The beauty of chastity!—the Pentateuch does not teach it. Thou shalt worship no other God?—that has been the burden of all religions.—Ingersoll.

IF the Bible is recognized as a human book, it will become of more real value to man. Now, it is by many worshiped ignorantly, as a sort of fetich. Others injure their intellectual powers and lose their common sense in attempting to make the works of different writers in different ages tell one harmonious story, as though written by one being. Others, who find some repulsiv and incredible things in the book, spurn the whole, because obliged to consider the book as a whole. If they were allowed to read the Old Testament as a record of the tradition, history, and poetry of a distant age, it would become an intelligible, interesting, and valuable book to them.—Adams.

THE strangest feature in the case is this. He [the Christian] not only thinks that it is prudent and wise on his part to improve his prospects of happiness in a future state; he considers it the noblest of all virtues. But there is no great merit in taking care of one's own interests, whether it be in this world or the next. The man who leads a truly religious life in order to go to heaven is not more to be admired than the man who leads a regular and industrious life in order to make a fortune in the city; and the man who endeavors to secure a celestial inheritance by going to church, and by reading chapters in the Bible, and by having family prayers, and by saying grace in falsetto, with eyes hypocritically closed, is not above the level of those who fawn and flatter at oriental courts in order to obtain a monopoly or an appointment.—Winwood Reade.

THE books I hav enumerated were canonical down till about three hundred and sixty years ago. Then a council of Protestant divines determined that they were not in the handwriting of the Ghost. The heavy majority of Christians, however, still believe that they are the work of that "comforter" and author. I repeat that it is unfortunate that the Ghost writes so perplexingly like Smith. Why did he not adopt a style of his own? He seems to hav no idiosyncrasy. Literary talent does not run in the family of Shaddai. The Father himself, amid a great deal of thunder and lightning at Sinai, wrote a very trite and stupid decalog, the egotistical burden of which was that they should hav no other God except himself. A very poor affair after so much thunder and lightning! Then Jerome informs us that the son could not write at all, nor read either, I should say, from his star-gazing enthusiasm and uncultured hallucinations. Then, as to the third "person," the Ghost, he has written with so little force and character that there are literally scores of books over which the learned hav wrangled for ages, unable to determin whether they were written by the literary member of the Trinity, or by some twopence-halfpenny hack of some ancient Grub street.—Saladin.

THE LORD AND SATAN DISCUSS JOB.

HOW TO MAKE A SACRED SCARECROW.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Kansas City correspondent of a Pittsburgh paper claims that although "the laws of the state are admirably adapted to suppress all Sunday desecration, yet the officers positivly refuse to interfere." Too sad! too bad!

A BAPTIST minister in Omaha told this to his congregation the other day: "There seems to be a wide-spread contempt for God's house and services. Apostasy from church attendance is a dominant trait of this city. Omaha is driving away her preachers. She is driving them away by neglect. In the four and a half years of my residence in this city many of your best ministers hav gone We cannot get a hearing for our savior, and we feel that as we hav but once to liv, it is our duty to reach as many people as possible, and hence, being unable to reach them here, we are going where we can get a hearing."

THE county court of Green county, Ky., has assessed $900 and costs against the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company for the violation of the Sunday law, by labor done in the repairing of tracks on Sunday; and the Frankfort court of appeals, on October 13th, affirmed the judgment. It is a significant fact, says the American Sentinel that the majority of the prosecutions under religious laws are in the Southern states, and that the vote of the board of lady managers of the World's Fair in favor of Sunday closing would hav gone largely the other way had it not been for the Southern members. Sam Small and W. F. Crafts also speak boastfully of the attitude of the Southern states upon the Sunday law question as being uncompromising for a strict enforcement.

"WE are supposed to be a peaceful nation," writes Col. Theodore A. Dodge, the well-known authority on military subjects, in the October Forum, "but we hav had our fair share of strife, foreign and domestic. Since the Revolution there hav been wars with England and with Mexico, with Tripoli and with Algiers; broils with Paraguay and Corea, and a gigantic civil war; rumors of war with France, England, Spain, and Italy. There hav been the John Brown raid, the Barnburner and Fenian raids to Canada, many incursions across the Mexican border, and the filibustering expeditions to Cuba and Nicaragua. We hav had the Whisky and Shays rebellions; the election, draft, railroad, reconstruction, and sundry serious city riots; we hav had well on to two hundred deadly Indian fights and many awful massacres. We hav lost more men in activ war since 1776 than any nation of Europe. This is a startling record for a peaceful nation."

"I HAV no sympathy for the men who are trying to close the World's Fair on Sunday," says the Rev. Mr Mackay, of Omaha. "The only valid argument so far advanced in favor of its closing is the extra labor devolving on the employees and those in charge, but an extra force of men will remove this objection. For the closing of the Fair on Sundays means the exclusion of thousands of poor men. Do the men who are advocating such a measure realize that there are hundreds of thousands of people who cannot afford to lose a day's pay during the week, and that every visit to the Fair made by such people means a curtailing of the necessaries of life? The protest against the opening of the Fair reminds one of what Macaulay said of the Puritans, 'That they hated bear-baiting not because of the pain it gave the bear, but because of the pleasure it gave the spectators.' Keep the Sabbatarians away from the Fair on Sundays. Let them giv the poor people a chance to see the sights on that day, their day. Let the rich go to church on that day in Chicago, but the man whose object was to see the Fair, let him not be disappointed."

HERBERT SPENCER has retracted his early views on woman's equality with man. He says that certain feminin traits incident to the maternal and conjugal relations render the female sex unsuited for the work of legislation. Women would incline instinctivly to introduce the ethics of the family into the ethics of the state, an introduction which, if extensiv and continuous, would be not only injurious, but fatal. The love of the helpless, characteristic of the parental instinct, is much stronger in women than in men, and sways their conduct much more powerfully, outside the family as well as inside. It would impel them therefore in a still greater degree to public actions unduly regardful of the inferior as compared with the superior. It would prompt them to confer public benefits not in proportion to deserts, but in proportion to the absence of deserts, to giv most where capacity is least. Still more than now, consequently, would the good which the superior hav earned be taken away from them forcibly to help the inferior, and still more than now would evils which the inferior hav brought upon themselvs be shouldered on to the superior.

GIVING his reason for engaging in the practice of law—which is, to earn money—Mr. H. O. Pentecost says: "I do not think it wise to suffer martyrdom unless one finds his happiness that way, as some persons do. It would not contribute to my happiness to be a martyr. During the last few years I hav learned something of the character of the class of persons, as a class, in whose behalf martyrdom is sometimes suffered, and I think they are not worth suffering for. A people who will put suffering on one who tries, and because he tries, to make the world a happier place to liv in, are not worth suffering for. These are very different views from those I once held. But I hav learned a few things during the last three or four years. I hav not been a very apt scholar, but I hav learned. One of the lessons I hav learned is that the working people, as a class, are in the unfortunate position they are in because, as a class, they are incapable of being any better off. They are wedded to the clergymen and the politicians. They will follow a black gown and a brass band into slavery, and they enjoy their servitude. They like to be humbugged, robbed, and ruled; and they love the men who humbug, rob, and rule them. This is said not of all the working people, for there are a growing number of whom this is not true, nor to blame those of whom it is true, but to describe them. I did not know this once. I know it now. When I did not know it I was willing to suffer, if need be, for the working people. Now that I know it, I am not."

The Gospel According to John.

FIFTH AND LAST.

54. John says nothing about the command of Jesus, "Go ye therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost;" nothing about the signs that should follow them that believe, to wit, "In my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick and they shall recover;" nothing about the unbeliever being damned; nothing even about the disciples tarrying at Jerusalem until they should be "endowed with power from on high." On the contrary, at the first meeting of the disciples after the resurrection, as described by John, that power from on high was transmitted to them, when Jesus said, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost."

55 Again, after eight days, says John, the disciples were assembled, and Thomas was there. And again Jesus appeared among them, though the doors were shut, saying: "Peace be unto you." Then, turning to Thomas, he said: "Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands; and reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side; and be not faithless, but believing." This was enough. "My Lord and my God!" said Thomas.

56. Here the gospel of John properly ends; for the writer adds:

> And many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of his disciples, which are not written in this book. But these are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Meshiha, the Son of God; and that believing ye might hav life through his name.

But apparently some later scribe has added another chapter, in which is described a third appearance of Jesus, not to the eleven disciples, but to seven of them, early in the morning, after they had fished all night and caught nothing. This is the first intimation in the fourth gospel that any of the disciples were fishermen. In the morning they saw a man on shore and knew not who he was. "Children, hav ye any meat?" inquired the man. "No," said they. "Cast the net on the right side of the ship," said he, "and ye shall find." They obeyed and were not able to draw it for the multitude of fishes. Then John said to Simon, "It is the Lord;" and forthwith Simon, who was naked, girt his fisher's coat upon him and cast himself into the sea, leaving the rest to bring the boat ashore. When they had all landed, they saw a fire of coals with fish laid thereon and bread. Jesus said to them, "Bring some of the fish which ye hav now caught." Simon went and drew in the net; it contained 153 fishes. "Come and dine," said Jesus. "And none of the disciples durst ask him, Who art thou? knowing that it was the Lord." Jesus distributed the bread and broiled fish among them. The dinner (or breakfast) being over, Jesus said: "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou me more than these?" Simon answered, "Yea, Lord, thou knowest that I love thee." "Feed my lambs," said Jesus. Again Jesus repeated the question, and again Simon made the same answer; and again Jesus said, "Feed my sheep." (First it was lambs.) A third time the question was repeated, which grieved Simon, and he answered, "Lord, thou knowest all things; thou knowest that I love thee." Jesus responded,

> Feed my sheep. Verily, verily, I say unto thee, when thou wast young thou girdedst thyself and walkedst whither thou wouldst; but when thou shalt be old, thou shalt stretch forth thy hands, and another shall gird thee, and carry thee whither thou wouldst not. Follow me.

Then Simon, turning to John, said, "Lord, and what shall this man do?" Jesus answered, "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee? Follow thou me."

> Then went this saying abroad among the brethren, that that disciple should not die; yet Jesus said not unto him, "He shall not die," but, "If I will that he tarry till I come, what is that to thee?" This is the disciple which testifieth these things, and wrote these things; and we know that his testimony is true.

The testimony of the witnesses who "hefted" the golden plates of the Book of Mormon is a little more emphatic, to wit: "And we lie not, God bearing witness of it."

Oh, John! why did you not tell us what became of Jesus? Why did you drop the curtain without exhibiting to us the promised ascension of the Logos to his father in heaven? Surely, if anyone witnessed that glorious event, you did; for were you not "the disciple whom Jesus loved," and to whom he commended his dear mother, saying: "Woman, behold thy son?" You told us that the last words of Jesus to Simon were spoken to signify "by what death he should glorify God." You hav left us in doubt whether you yourself were ever going to die. Do you want us to believe that you are still a wandering Jew, waiting for the advent of the Meshiha?

And why, O disciple whom Jesus loved, did you fail to notice the transfiguration of your master, a most wonderful event, described by the other three evangelists as witnessed by yourself, your brother James, and Simon Kepha?

And why did you giv us so few of the miracles, omitting nearly all narrated in the other gospels, and describing several which they did not notice?

And why did you omit the numerous parables spoken by Jesus and recorded by the other evangelists, who tell us that "without a parable spake he not unto them?"

In short, why did you giv us so little of the life of Jesus, and that little so different from or contradictory to the other gospel writers?

57. Evidently there was some cause for the abrupt and incomplete ending of the fourth gospel; for the writer adds, in conclusion:

> And there are also many other things which Jesus did, the which, if they should be written, I suppose that even the world itself could not contain the books that should be written.

And this hyperbolical supposition is called plenary inspiration!

58. Out of the many irreconcilable discrepancies between the fourth gospel and the other three there is one that is of vital importance. Was the crucifixion of Jesus on the great passover-day, as the synoptics describe it, or on the day before, as described by John? That the synoptic writers were wrong is proved by the fact that the Jewish law forbade a trial and execution on the great passover-day; and the further fact that the passover was never allowed to fall on Friday. Therefore, if the crucifixion ever took place, it was on a Friday before the passover and the Sabbath as John describes it.

59. In what year did the crucifixion occur? In a compilation of thirty-two leading authorities, ancient and modern, fixing the probable year, the result is as follows: A.D. 29, six authorities; A.D. 30, seven; A.D. 31, four; A.D. 32, three; A.D. 33, eleven; A.D. 34, none; A.D. 35, one.

In those successiv years the passover fell on the following days:

A.D. 29, April 17th, Sunday.
A.D. 30, April 7th, Friday.
A.D. 31, March 27th, Monday.
A.D. 32, April 15th, Monday.
A.D. 33, April 6th, Saturday.
A.D. 34, April 23d, Friday.
A.D. 35, April 13th, Wednesday.

There may be a variation of a day in some of the above years, but no more.

When the full moon came on Friday, the feast of the passover would be deferred till Saturday, making it "a high day," as John says. Hence there might hav been a trial and execution, according to John, on Friday in the year 30, or 33, or 34. The first of these years would hav been too early to allow a three years' ministry for Jesus; therefore the only possible year, according to John, was A.D. 33 or 34.

But opposed to either of these years we hav the testimony of the early fathers, Clement of Alexandria and Tertullian of Carthage, who say that the crucifixion was in the fifteenth year of Tiberius Cæsar, A.D. 29, and the same year is fixed in the recently discovered Syriac documents, supposed to belong to the fourth century. The testimony of Tertullian, however, is invalidated by his assertion that March 25th was the day of the crucifixion. The full moon of March A.D. 29, was on the 18th of that month, and the next full moon, April 17th, was the time of the passover. Even Friday March 25th, which was seven days after the full moon, was one day earlier than the passover ever occurred.

Furthermore, we hav no doubt that the works of Tertullian were forged in the fifteenth century; and we are well-nigh convinced that all the writings of the so-called early fathers are also modern forgeries.

60. When was the fourth gospel written? About A.D. 80, says Doctor Lardner; about A.D. 130, says Doctor Davidson; probably a little later, say other rational critics. The earliest evidence of the existence of the four gospels is said to be in the latter end of the second century. But if the writings of the so-called fathers were forged after the revival of learning all this evidence of the antiquity of the gospels is valueless. The learned Jesuit Hardouin says that the work of forgery began about the year 1335, when Petrarch found some of Cicero's "Familiar Epistles" and two of his orations. In the next century Poggio Bracciolini discovered the entire collection of Cicero's "Epistles to Atticus" and numerous other Latin works, among which were the so-called "Annals of Tacitus" and the writings of Tertullian. It is now proved that Poggio forged the "Annals of Tacitus" and the probability is that he fabricated all the other writings that he pretended to find.

Hardouin, who died in 1729, said that, with the exception of the holy scriptures, there were no manuscripts more than four hundred years old. That is to say, none older than Petrarch, the first finder of ancient manuscripts. And here comes in a suspicion that even the holy scriptures should not be excepted—that is to say, in their present form. King James's translators had no old manuscripts before them—only "a Greek text which Erasmus, in 1516, and Stephens, in 1550, had formed from manuscripts later than the tenth century." So says Tischendorf, who claimed to hav discovered in 1844 the oldest of all Greek codices of the New Testament. "Since the sixteenth century," says Tischendorf, "Greek manuscripts hav been discovered of far greater antiquity than those of Erasmus and Stephens." And after naming the Vatican codex, which first appeared in the catalog of 1475, and which, he thinks, may be as old as the middle of the fourth century, he claims that the codex which he found on Mount Sinai is even a little older and may be one of fifty copies which Constantine is said to hav ordered in the year 331.

The next oldest codex is claimed to be the Alexandrine, which was brought by the patriarch of Constantinople from Alexandria in 1628, and is believed by Tischendorf to hav been written about the middle of the fifth century.

But some scholars doubt the great antiquity of these three codices of the New Testament. And it is a curious fact that soon after the publication of the Sinaitic codex in fac-simile an audacious fellow in Europe proclaimed that he wrote the manuscript himself; and his assertion was considered important enough to draw forth an elaborate refutation.

It may be that the gospels as we hav them were substantially the same in the second, third, and fourth centuries, nevertheless there is room for suspicion that the hand of the Benedictine forger may yet be detected in the oldest codices of the New Testament. Not that the nucleus of the gospel stories was fabricated in modern times, but if these oldest manuscripts shall appear to hav been written many centuries later than they purport to be, then who knows what alterations and additions may hav been made by the transcribers? And what if it shall appear that the Sinaitic codex, so mysteriously found in a convent on Mount Sinai in 1844, just ready to be used for fuel, but saved by the purchase money of a Russian emperor in 1859, and the Alexandrine codex, resurrected in Egypt in 1628 and sold to King Charles I. of England, are both cunningly devised copies of the Vatican codex, first catalogued in 1475 for a Roman library that was then only twenty-five years old?

Leaving the problem of the real age of the oldest codices of the New Testament to be solved by our successors, we venture to suspect that the fictitious story of a Jesus crucified under Pontius Pilate may hav been fabricated as late as the fourteenth century.

But whether the oldest extant codex of the gospel according to John was written in the fourth or fourteenth century, the nucleus of the story of the ministry and death of Jesus was probably recorded some time before the beginning of the Christian era. For the real Jesus was stoned and hanged about the year 75 B.C., and Nicodemus, a ruler of the Jews, and Malichus, a servant of the high priest Hyrcanus, were both contemporary with that same Jesus.

Sepher Toldoth Jeshu, "Book of the Generation of Jesus," who was born at Bethlehem about the year 106 B.C., being the son of a betrothed maiden named Mary, by Joseph Pandera, probably contains more truth concerning the person miscalled Christ than can be gathered from all the four gospels.

ANTICHRIST.

English Notes.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKERS: Some good people seem to think that because Mrs. Besant has, to a large extent, left our platforms, we are, therefore, without lady lecturers in the field. That is not so, however. Admittedly Mrs. Besant leaves a big gap in the ranks, but we hav still two ladies who are able to plead our cause with their sex. The name of one is probably known to Americans who read the English Freethought papers—I mean Thornton Smith. For many years she has been before the public; and although she savors a good deal of her stanch friend, Mrs. Besant, both in matter and manner, she is none the less acceptable in many halls. Her delivery is good and her views thoroughly sound from our standpoint. Mrs. Smith was at one time secretary of the Ball's Pond Club. For many years she managed the retail department of the Freethought Publishing Company, at 63 Fleet street, and only left it after Mr. Bradlaugh's death necessitated the wind-up of that ill-starred company. She next figured as secretary of the United Democratic Club in Chancery Lane and is now editor of the Woman's Herald. Unfortunately this last occupation prevents her being as frequently seen on the platform as hitherto, and we can only hope that her plain, forcible way of putting Secularism before the masses may not be lost to us entirely through her editorial labors.

The other lady is Mrs. Louisa Samson, who more properly should be associated with the Women's Liberal Federation, for which she has done much lecturing work. Last winter she delivered a capital lecture for the Edmonton branch on "Why Women Should be Secularists," and she very wisely published it in cheap pamphlet form. Mrs. Samson is a vigorous worker for Freethought in addition to other useful undertakings, and with her husband infuses new life into sickly societies. Quite recently she presided over a conference of the North Middlesex Secular Federation, and encouraged the members by giving them sterling advice as to the necessity of safeguarding their right to speak on common lands.

Your old contributor, "J. D.," has just been in to see me. He is suffering from a bad cold, which seems unwilling to leave him. "J. D." is not an orator and takes no very activ part in the propaganda, but he is a sound Freethinker all the same. I first came in contact with him through your late chieftain, D. M. Bennett, whom he almost worships. "J. D.'s" forte is book-collecting. The amount of current literature he takes in is prodigious for a non-literary man; and his hobby is to read the scientific portions, then carefully bind up the numbers and store them away in his capacious book-shelvs. By this time he must hav some thousands of volumes, many of them bound by himself in leisure moments.

Toward the close of the Mahatma controversy in the daily Chronicle, the Rev. J. B. Coles, of the Calcutta University—the energetic "Number Five"—challenged Mrs. Besant to a public debate on Theosophy. Arrangements hav now been made by which the debate will take place at St. George's Hall on Tuesday, November 10th. Mr. Coles will argue that "the historical and esoteric explanation of the symbols of the serpent and the cross, as given by Madam Blavatsky, is both defectiv and misleading, and, therefore, instead of throwing true light upon the signs and symbols of ancient and modern religions, is calculated to deceive earnest seekers after truth." Mrs. Besant will argue the reverse, defending her dead teacher and the Theosophy which she got from her.

Whatever else may be said against Mrs. Besant, it must be admitted that it is good to hav all subjects investigated and brought home to the comparativly thoughtless. For eighteen months Freethinkers hav heard the good lady's expositions and hav so far failed to find reasonable grounds for believing her extraordinary statements. The main points at issue are (1) that Mrs. Besant apparently expects us to adopt her views because she holds them, and (2) that we cannot let what we believe to be superstitious teachings usurp the place of ordinary Freethought lectures upon our central and national platform Apart from this attitude I am glad to see Mrs. Besant making a study of occult science, for it will make manifest the mysteries and rob it of its charm. From Mrs. Besant I hav received many tokens of sympathy in my endeavor to spread Secularism in a London suburb. I do not believe she is as selfish as some people declare, nor do I believe that she is in any degree fraudulent. Her sufferings for Freethought hav told upon her nerves and she is no longer the woman she was, though as eloquent as ever; and although the public craving for sensation has been gratified by this Theosophic outburst and Mrs. Besant has acquired a greater degree of popularity, those of us who knew her at her best as a social reformer and Freethinker cannot see her leave the old tracks without feeling that pity which is ever akin to love.

The various subscriptions which hav been floated during the past twelve months hav given the funds of the National Secular Society a tremendous shaking, of which the half has not yet been told. The rank and file of our party are decidedly poor, and, on the other hand, they are most laudably generous. When their gifts are all added together they amount to very little more than the barest necessities of their branch require. Therefore, it is to the wealthier people we hav to look for supplementary funds. Such moneys hav been given also with some degree of liberality; but unfortunately for us, such funds as the Bradlaugh Memorial, the Bradlaugh Liabilities, the Charles Watts start, and so on, added to the heavy purchases of books from the Freethought Publishing Company before Mr. Bradlaugh's death and his library since, hav drawn off from the National Secular Society the very sources of income without which it cannot pay its way. A lady who made the collection at the Hall of Science last Thursday night after the free lecture told me that I would be surprised at the number of half-pennies (cents) which were dropped into the collecting-box. On the other hand, I was not surprised except to find that they were still able to subscribe anything. When will our middle classes learn to be as self-sacrificing in the cause of truth as our poorer brethren are?

Last Sunday afternoon I was lecturing at Tottenham, and a saintly lay preacher jumped upon me for misquoting a text. That was safe, as I had not a Bible with me, for I was not lecturing on a Bible subject. But the secretary had a much more useful volume in his hand. Mr. G. W. Foote's "Bible Hand-Book" is a perfect treasure for an extempore el fresco lecturer; and the book was quickly demanded by an outsider that he might see for himself the misquoted (!) text in black and white. Of course the charge did not hold. That is by no means the first time that the "Hand-Book" has proved its value in argument. The subjects are so cleverly grouped and the texts so wisely printed in full, that the lecturer can force home uncomfortable truths about the Bible on most points without the help of a concordance or waste of time in turning from chapter to chapter of the "sacred" book.

A Leicester friend has favored me with a copy of the Countryman, a newspaper with a history. It is freely distributed and is an engin of Freethought advocacy without pretending to be anything of the sort. An anonymous party edits the sheet. An old fellow trudges about the country for advertisments and agents. On publishing days he sees to the distribution, and at the end of the month all expenses are met by the advertisments and thousands of people hav an uninvited taste of Secularism. The fun of the thing is that religious people relish the broad views of the Countryman who would squirm if they touched THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Yours fraternally, SAM STANDRING.

London, Oct. 12, 1891.

Items of Foreign Freethought News.

Two new auxiliary societies and five individual members are the additions to the French Freethought Federation for the month past.

We are pleased to inform our readers that Dr. Titus Voelkel is on the sure road to recovery. And we hope soon to hear from him in his former paper, Freireligiöses Sonntags Blatt.

The twenty-thousand-franc prize of the Academie Francaise has been given to the famous geographer, Elisée Reclus, for his "New Universal Geography." Elisée Reclus is an outspoken Freethinker, and, like all genuin scientists, has no use for a God.

The famous novel, "Down With the Weapons," by the Freethinker Bertha von Sutton, has been translated into Danish, Norwegian, Dutch, and French. It is decidedly better than "Robert Elsmere." The authoress is not afraid to giv her opinions on all kinds of "sacred subjects."

Statues of Nicholaus Lenau and Anastasius Grün hav been erected on the Schiller square in Vienna, through the efforts of Karl Scherzer, the Freethinking president of the city committee on monuments. Both Lenau and Grün are well-known poets of last century, but as they were Freethinkers, justice of course was tardy in recognizing their merit.

The Buddhists in Ceylon are very activ—too much so, thinks a writer in the Methodist Times. They hav an orphan institution and several schools, the educational and moral value of which is such that the nativs are rapidly ceasing to send their children to the Christian missionaries. They likewise spread Antichristian tracts among the population of the island.

The South Australian Register (May 25th) announces that a very pious lady has willed $80,000 to the church. Her sister, who is a cripple, wrote to the church authorities asking for help, stating that she was suffering from hunger. The authorities answered that they had received the $80,000 and intended to keep every cent. This is practical Christianity.

Fritänkaren will hereafter come out in two editions; one will keep the old name, Fritänkaren, the other is baptized Tanh Sjelf! (Think for Yourself!) The contents of the two papers will be alike, only the name separating them. This new venture is undertaken that more people can read and become acquainted with "our side." Then it is found that very many are being scared away by the old name. We hope the scheme will succeed.

In France there are several statues erected in honor of famous Freethinkers. Those to Etienne Dolet and Danton are the latest. Dolet was burnt for heresy, Danton executed for patriotism. The Catholics and conservativs are greatly shocked, but the city and state authorities hav outgrown the swaddling clothes of religion. Not so here in the United States. Nearly a century has passed and we seek in vain for a statue of the patriot and humanitarian Thomas Paine.

An Italian literatteur and member of the lower house of the Italian Congress writes in an article in Nuova Antalogia: "That Atheism progresses among the laboring classes, and democracy in the cities, are only indications of rebellion against God-appointed and ecclesiastical authority. The God in whose name the church speaks stands side by side with the capitalist. Therefore, if the poor of the future shall not hate life, one thing above all is necessary: abolish God."

Considerable anxiety is expressed in leading Freethought circles, in this country as well as abroad, concerning the fate of the Swedish-Finnish Freethought martyr Henry V. Berghell. He is said to hav left Copenhagen via Hamburg en route for this country. This was two months ago, yet he has not been seen in the States. There is a good deal of dark business going on between the Danish and Russian courts, and it would not be surprising to hear that Mr. Berghell has safely arrived at one or another of the Siberian mines.

Those of our friends who hav occasion to write to Fritänkaren will please address communications to Mrs. Anna B. Wicksell, Engelbrektsgaten, 43 B. 2 tr., Stockholm, Sweden. Mrs. Wicksell will occupy the place formerly filled by Captain Thomson. We extend a cordial welcome to our new colaboress, who will, among other duties, furnish "Items of Foreign Freethought News" to the Fritänkaren once every month. The address of Captain Thomson is Surbrunsgaten, 35 Stockholm, Sweden.

In Fritänkaren of October 1st Victor E. Lennstrand, in an editorial note, announces that our friend Capt. Otto Thomson has retired from the management of that journal, and, on behalf of Sweden's Freethinkers, thanks the captain for all that he has done for the cause. Only few know how much the Freethinkers of Sweden owe to Captain Thomson. When Freethought was a crime in Sweden—when persecution, fines, and imprisonment were the recognitions that a blinded people, a cringing justice, and a bigoted tyrant gave those who above all deserve the thanks of mankind, then Captain Thomson bravely stood forward in defense of truth and liberty. He gave his money, his time, yes, his whole person, to the struggling cause. Although an old man in years, he seemed endowed with the ardor and vitality of youth. He organized, he spoke in public, he told the world the story of Christian love and tolerance in Sweden. At last persecution abated, but the captain left not his post. He remained until the ship he had launched, the Swedish Freethought movement, was safely in port. Now he retires, weary of battle and strife. Younger shoulders will hav to take the burden. But it will be difficult to fill his place; for in his person were combined capability, experience, and love for the work. The Freethinkers of Sweden, without any exception, cannot be too thankful to the captain for the work he has done, and we are confident that in the hearts of Swedish Freethinkers of generations to come there will always be a cheerful, warm memory's corner for the godfather of Freethought in Sweden, the Infidel pioneer, Capt. Otto Thomson.

Bewitching by Images.

Traces of this primitiv superstition are also found among civilized people, for Grimm reports that in the eleventh century Jews were accused in Europe of having killed Bishop Ebergard by a sorcery of the kind. They were said to hav made a figure of wax representing the bishop, hired a priest to baptize it, and put it into the fire. As soon as the wax was melted, the bishop was attacked by a mortal disease. The famous adventurer, Jacob, chief of the Pastorals, in the thirteenth century, seriously believed, as he says in his "Demonology," that the devil taught men the art of making images of wax and clay, the destruction of which brought on the sickness and death of the persons they represented. It was a custom in the time of Catherine de Medici to make such figures of wax, and melt them slowly before the fire or stab them with needles, in order to bring suffering to enemies. This operation was called putting a spell upon them. We may also mention the opinion of the earlier Christian writers, who believed, according to Draper, that painting and sculpture were interdicted in the scriptures, and were consequently evil arts. It may be questioned if this opinion did not hav its roots in the idea of primitiv peoples that the art of drawing was an instrument of sorcery, by means of which one acquired the power to act upon a person. Mussulmans still hav a horror of images, and the Koran forbids having one's portrait made and possessing any image at all.—L. Popoff, in The Popular Science Monthly.

WE must here repeat what Locke has so strongly urged—Define your terms. . . . The words substantial form were pronounced for two thousand years without suggesting the least notion. For these, plastic natures hav been substituted, but still without anything being gained. A traveler, stopped in his way by a torrent, asks a villager on the opposit bank to show him the ford. "Go to the right," shouts the countryman. He takes the right and is drowned. The other runs up crying: "Oh! how unfortunate! I did not tell him to go to his right, but to mine!" The world is full of these misunderstandings. How will a Norwegian, when reading this formula, Servant of the Servants of God, discover that it is the Bishop of Bishops and King of Kings who speaks?—Voltaire.

American Secular Union Congress.

"I Said in My Haste, All Men Are Liars."

The shortest and meanest congress ever held by the American Secular Union, either as a Union or as the National Liberal League, was its fifteenth annual meeting begun and concluded on Saturday, October 31st, at Philadelphia, R. B. Westbrook, D D., in the chair. It was a Methodist ecumenical council on a small scale. At Syracuse, when the League split, there was a good deal of unfairness and meanness from the presiding officer and his secretary, and some asperity from their opponents, but a Presbyterian preacher has decided advantage over a college professor, and so far as the reporter's acquaintance with the Union goes, none of its previous officers had been in it with Mr. Westbrook and Miss Craddock. Most of the mean things were said, and in every case started, by them, and their reports are but ill-concealed abuse of the Liberals of the country and a defense of Unitarianism. At Portsmouth, last year, surface indications showed where the iron lay, but owing to their desire to be reëlected, and the tolerance of those who opposed them, they restrained themselvs, Mr. Westbrook taking back his threat to resign if he couldn't hav his literary society charter, and Miss Craddock subduing her desire to follow her leader, right or wrong. This year they had no hope of reëlection, and they took the Unitarian masks off their faces.

Long before the congress the officers had logrolled a ticket for their succession, and engaged enough estimable Philadelphia ladies to be at the congress to make a majority of those likely to attend. The hall was hired for only one session, it being the evident purpose of the conspirators to read their reports, push the election through, and adjourn. But owing to Mr. Wakeman's determination to tell the President what he thought of him, another two hours was added to the life of the Union. The congress was in session less than four hours, which, considering the importance of its annual meetings to the organization, was remarkably quick work. At the expiration of that time the Union was turned over to some people who did not think enough of it to even attend the congress, and who, with one, or perhaps two, exceptions, hav no fame outside their own circle of friends. The Union is again practically defunct, and it was all done in this way:

About half past ten there were less than forty people in Industrial Hall, some of whom had come there to transfer the Union to Chicago, some to see if a little life couldn't be put into the organization, and some to look on. When the Committee on Credentials—Mr. J. F. Foster, of the Boston Ingersoll Secular Society, and Mr. Edward C. Wharton, of Philadelphia, assisted by the Secretary—read their list, the following were found entitled to vote:

Leonard Geiger,	E. M. Macdonald,
Mrs. Geiger,	Capt. Rbt. C. Adams,
Miss Lillie Geiger,	E. C. Wharton,
E. W. Chamberlain,	R. M. Robinson,
Cynthia Leonard,	Ida C. Craddock,
Huldah H. Gunn,	R. B. Westbrook, D.D.,
E. B. Foote, Jr.,	F. C. Mende,
E. Schachtel,	Mr. —— Taylor,
C. P. Somerby,	Mrs. O'Neil,
Marie C. Burnier,	Mrs. Holcombe,
Mrs. Alex. Bremer,	Mrs. Stauffer,
Thaddeus B. Wakeman,	Ritteles Robinson,
Mrs. Ida M. Bachellor,	P. Jauncey,
F. J. Burnier,	Mrs. Annie Troth,
J. F. Foster,	Mrs. H. P. Westbrook,
T. S. Frisbie,	Dr. Lafayette Snyder,
A. P. Lloyd,	Dr. John Kays.

Some of these, however, were not present, and some more who were wished they were not. After the list was read the President laid his report upon the desk and began. The report is a scold at everything and everybody Liberal and a defense of the Prize Manual against the charge that it teaches religion. The report is full of false statements, querulous quibbles, petty insinuations, and illogical attempts at reasoning. It also stated, or hinted at, his determination to elect his successor in Chicago. Here it is in extenso:

To the Members and Friends of the American Secular Union, Present and Absent:

We say "present and absent," because we know that far the larger number are absent, which is necessarily the case every year, but especially so this year, as we hav no attractiv program to offer in the way of addresses.

"Why did you call the Congress to meet in Philadelphia, when we met there only two years ago, and why hav you not provided popular addresses for the occasion?" we may be asked. We briefly answer: Because no other place invited us and we had no money to hire a hall, print posters, and advertise in the papers, to say nothing of the lack of funds to pay for traveling expenses, and to secure the services of popular speakers. The last Congress was a great success because our friends at Portsmouth raised $500 for expenses and gave us most efficient coöperation in working up an interest.

And right here we might as well express the opinion that a system of voting by proxy should be adopted by the American Secular Union, as the wide territory over which our members are scattered makes it impracticable for any considerable number to assemble in any one place. The Northwestern states and the states on the Pacific slope are seldom or never represented, although many of our most liberal contributors reside in those sections. This plan of voting by proxy at our Congress, giving all of our friends an opportunity to vote on the election of officers, and on other important questions, was contemplated by the Charter and By-Laws offered at the last Congress and rejected—as we think—without just reasons. It is more than ever apparent that our society should be incorporated, for many reasons, but principally for the fact that many of our aged friends are passing away, who would gladly giv a portion of their means could they do so legally.

The first business to which we giv attention is the failure of the Board to appoint Mr. John R. Charlesworth a field secretary, as, hastily and without due consideration or remark, he was recommended by the last Congress. This vote of the Congress was accompanied by another equally unanimous vote, that the money for his salary of $1,000 should first be pledged, which not being done, the Board had no alternativ but to decline the recommendation. Although the Board had other good reasons for not making the appointment, it is not necessary to enumerate them here. Suffice it to say that there was nothing against the moral character of Mr. Charlesworth, and no member of the Board was influenced by prejudice or other unworthy motiv.

A proposition was made to appoint Mr. Charles Watts a field secretary, and the Board fully believes that it could hav raised the money necessary for his salary and expenses; but the opposition of the three principal Freethought papers (so called), one now defunct, and several of the (so-called) Liberal professional lecturers, and a few others, made it expedient to abandon the project. Whether the alleged reasons for this opposition were entirely unselfish it is not necessary to here express an opinion. Since those not favorable to the employment of Mr. Watts were generally in favor of appointing Mr. Charlesworth, it would seem that there were special reasons by which they were influenced. The lecturers seemed to think that the employment of one of such remarkable talents, specially indorsed by the Union, would giv him undue advantage over other lecturers, while the editors seemed to think that his connection with the paper, Secular Thought, would giv that paper a certain prestige in the competition for public patronage. Why the National Society should not hav a field secretary, when several of the state organizations deem it necessary to employ one or more, is one of those things hard to understand. While the Board, in the interests of peace and harmony, gave up their desire to appoint Mr. Watts, they still think that they erred in doing so. The result has been that Mr. Watts has returned to England, and we are no longer to hav his most eloquent and efficient coöperation in America.

It is with great pleasure that we are able to announce the publication of the Prize Manual originated two years ago. After examining a large number of manuscripts, the prize was divided between Nicholas Paine Gilman, editor of the Literary World, and author of a widely-circulated book on "Profit Sharing," and Edward Payson Jackson, a master and professor in the celebrated Boys' Latin School, of Boston, and also a popular author. These gentlemen were paid $500 each, and magnanimously agreed to use the money in publishing their essays. This was most fortunate, as the American Secular Union had no money to publish the books, and they must hav remained in manuscript but for the generosity of the authors. The two productions are published in one volume of nearly four hundred pages, under the title of "Conduct as a Fine Art," and also published separately under the title of "The Laws of Daily Conduct" (pp. 160), and "Character Building" (pp. 230). The books bear the imprint of the well-known and respectable publishers of Houghton, Mifflin & Co., of Boston and New York. Due credit is given to the American Secular Union in the preface; and the final proof-sheets were read and in some things corrected by the Chairman of the Examining Committee. It has been demonstrated that the purest principles of morality can be taught, without religious dogma, and it is believed that Roman Catholics or Protestants, Jews or Atheists, Deists or Agnostics can find nothing to criticise in these two carefully prepared books. They are as well adapted to families as to schools, and it is hoped that no Freethinker's family will be without them. We recommend the two volumes in one (price $1.50). The two single volumes come at $1 each.

The books can be had through booksellers generally, and will be furnished anywhere in the United States at publishers' prices, postage free, by the Secretary. It would be easy to dilate on the importance of this now accomplished project to the American Secular Union, and to the cause of good morals generally, but this is not the place. The amount of labor that this project has involved was simply immense, and has mainly been performed by the President and Secretary. Can the American Secular Union point to any work it has accomplished in the fifteen years of its existence as important and permanent as this? It is believed that the books will be largely adopted by families and teachers and that the American Secular Union will receive its meed of gratitude and praise. Let all Secularists labor to promote the circulation of this Manual.

Some very unjust criticism has been made which can here be properly noticed. The mistake of the critic is in not distinguishing between religion and religious dogma. Pure religion, as defined by Francis E. Abbott, is morality, and in this he is backed by Tyndall and Renan. The former says: "The facts of religious feeling are to me as certain as the facts of physics. . . . The world will hav a religion of some kind. . . . To yield this sentiment reasonable satisfaction is the problem of problems at this hour." While Renan says: "Devotion is as natural as egoism to true-born men. . . . The organization of devotion is religion." That Messrs. Gilman and Jackson proclaimed in the preface of their book that they are "friends to religion" was no violation of the unsectarian principle, but only goes to show that pure morals can be taught without a recognition, even by religious people, of any of the dogmas of religion. Nor was there any "discourtesy" in failing to mention the names of those who contributed the $1,000 premium. The "roll of honor" had been widely published, and the premium was paid to the authors by the American Secular Union, and not by the individuals who subscribed the money. The American Secular Union is fully recognized, and no more could be expected from the authors, who published the essays—with their own money. Instead of carping, we should be thankful that the books called forth by the American Secular Union are published without a dime of expense to the Union, and placed within reach of our members at a reasonable price, besides being placed within the reach of thousands of others, not in fellowship with our society, but whom we greatly desire to interest in true unsectarian morality. Mr. Jackson says: "But besides being insulting to good men and to the being whom so many good men believe in and worship, the profane man is unutterably vulgar." In the same chapter, in speaking of pagan temples, he says: "It matters not that the temple he profanes is the sanctuary of a pagan religion, that the divinity he insults exists only in the imagination of a deluded people." He no more teaches Theism than heathenism, by a simple recognition of a fact well known to everyone.

The main question has, we believe, been thus settled in the Girard College Will Case, that the purest principles of morality can be taught without teaching sectarian dogma, and in due time, now near, measures will be adopted to test this matter with the Board of City Trusts, peaceably if possible, but through the courts, if necessary. Specific action has been delayed until these essays were ready. The case is now in the hands of experienced and wise counselors.

There is no use in attempting to disguise the fact that there is among us a serious difference of opinion as to the principles and policy of the American Secular Union. The majority of the Board (if not all of them) agree on the written constitution of the society, and especially on Article IV, which is as follows:

ARTICLE IV—NON-PARTISAN.

"The American Secular Union is strictly unsectarian and non-partisan in both religion and politics, but will use any and all honorable means to secure its objects as above stated. It is not either publicly or privately committed to the advancement of any system of religious belief or disbelief, but honestly welcomes all persons of whatever faith or party to its membership, on the basis of 'no union of church and state.' The word 'secular' is here used in the broadest sense, as applied to the state, and not to any system of religion or philosophy."

The history of this article is as follows:

Finding, during the first year of our administration, that certain persons were disposed to consider us bound to add to our constitution certain principles of Secular philosophy (so called), and in order to settle this question, we prepared and published in all our Liberal papers for more than thirty days previous to the Philadelphia Congress in 1889 an amendment to the constitution. This proposed amendment the Philadelphia Congress still further amended, and unanimously adopted.

Some few—very few—persons afterward objected to this article; but no effort was made to amend or repeal it at the Portsmouth Congress. We are satisfied that four fifths, if not nine-tenths, of the members of our society are in favor of it. If it is so unacceptable to members of the Union, why hav not the dissatisfied ones brought up the matter in a legal way for amendment or modification at one of the succeeding Congresses, instead of finding fault?

In securing a complete separation of church and state, a large number of persons of every possible creed, and of no creed, can work and are working with great energy. We hav now before us a list of patriotic Secular and religious societies, all pledged to work for state Secularization. Some of these societies are a hundred times larger than our society and hav done proportionally more work than we hav ever done.

The same is true regarding individuals who are members of orthodox churches. We do not expect to interest the churches as organized bodies; but they are full of individuals who are anxious to coöperate with us for state Secularization. Moreover, many churches in their organized form hav taken action for the taxation of churches and the prohibition of reading the Bible in the public schools. We need the assistance of these people, and we cannot secure the legislation we desire without their help. Shall we be so narrow, sectarian, and bigoted as to drive them away from us?

But what is this Secular philosophy for which a few clamor so vociferously? It is nothing less than Materialism, pure and simple—nothing more and nothing less It is opposition to the supernatural and the spiritual. It affirms that there is no God and no future state of being for mortals. All this may be true, but intelligent Freethinkers generally say that they do not know. Like Huxley and Ingersoll, they are Agnostics. Those who believe in Spirit are thought to outnumber Materialists a hundred to one, and perhaps more; and they point to learned men not a few who support their views. Theists are also very numerous; and distinguished Secular philosophers hav distinctly acknowledged that both Theists and Spiritualists may be good and consistent Secularists. Why, then, should we not seek their coöperation in working for state Secularization? We need their help. We can never succeed without them, as our success in securing state Secularization depends upon numbers. Now, then, if believers in Secular philosophy (that is, Materialism) see fit to organize to propagate their peculiar views, they hav a perfect right to do so; but they hav no right to force it into a society which has for its main object the complete separation of church and state.

If the American Secular Union is indeed a society for the promotion of certain forms of Secular philosophy, then let it say so in so many words. Let it throw off all disguises and appear in its true character, and not attempt to masquerade under the disguise of state Secularization. This, common honesty requires; and nothing less will satisfy intelligent and honest friends of truth Moreover, if the great and increasing number of Liberals, and the uncounted numbers who call themselvs by no particular name, cannot be enrolled in our ranks on the basis of state Secularization, then we are reckoning without our host. We should at once take our position as a band of Materialists, haul down the flag of "No union of church and state" as our special ensign, and show our true colors. For our part, we are not willing to be a party to any deceit. We are not all believers in this kind of Secular philosophy, though, through the mistaken zeal of some who hav spoken at our annual meetings, we are naturally considered such. We cannot unite a material philosophy with our one avowed object of state Secularization, and, in our judgment, to attempt it is neither honest nor honorable.

When first elected President, I accepted the office provisionally, and no objection was made to the conditions. It was in these words:

"Regarding the American Secular Union as an organization for the protection and promotion of the principle implied in its name, and not for the advancement of any dogma of religious belief or disbelief, I cordially accept the presidency unanimously tendered me, and publicly pledge myself to resist the encroachments of sacerdotalism, whether Papal or Puritan."

This was sent by telegraph to Pittsburgh; and subsequently I wrote, and "promised the utmost firmness and diligence in maintaining the demands of Liberalism, and an honest conformity to the secular principle upon which our government was founded."

If the leaders were not satisfied with this provisional acceptance, the Pittsburgh Congress should hav said so at once, as it was still in session, and the succeeding Philadelphia Congress should not hav incorporated it in its fundamental law. The Freethought papers hav kept up an almost constant fire upon the President and Secretary, either editorially or by their correspondents, for not renouncing their well-known principles, and openly violating the essential provisions of our constitution. This narrow and extreme policy of a few of our members, and notably of some of our Liberal papers, has brought the American Secular Union where it is to-day. Nearly 300 auxiliary societies hav been reduced to a dozen, while such men as Francis E. Abbot, B. F. Underwood, and the whole army of the Free Religious Association and many others hav been driven from our ranks. Even Robert G. Ingersoll has been pushed aside, and for several years has no longer coöperated with us because of side issues that were dragged into the society.

We hav been under the necessity of communicating with Liberals through our Liberal papers, while at the same time those papers hav inveighed against the society and its executiv officers. Editors of papers hav a perfect right to advocate their own views; it is nevertheless a fact that they should do it in such a way as not to disgust and drive from our ranks Theists and Spiritualists and other Freethinkers. Theists are said to "buy a god and a pig in a poke!" "God is given a Lashing." . . . "God (under certain conditions) is the biggest and the meanest villain ever heard of" and "The Christian's God is a dirty dog!" The same style is adopted toward Spiritualists, as they are seldom spoken of without a sneer at "spooks" and "spookdom." Now these papers hav a perfect right to be vulgar if they so desire, but it is a question whether the American Secular Union should make them its organs. Then it should not be forgotten that several of these papers pose before the public as objects of charity, and thus come in competition with the American Secular Union for contributions. The failure of Freethought has done more harm to the cause of Liberalism than this journal ever did good. One of our $100 subscribers in New England assigns as a reason for not continuing his subscription any longer that he lost $1,200 in the Freethought Publishing Company; while another noble man on the Pacific coast has withdrawn from all coöperation with Liberals because of this failure. The fact is, the American Secular Union should hav an organ of its own, if only a little sheet published monthly, or, if need be, quarterly.

Notwithstanding all the disabilities under which we hav labored, the American Secular Union has done well the last year. Our Treasurer's report will show our gross cash receipts to be $2,131 45, including the money raised by our Portsmouth friend for the expenses of the Congress. Many of our contributors hav done nobly—giving of their money over and over again—and many new subscribers hav been enrolled on our books. Though the California State Society advised its friends to withhold its contributions until the American Secular Union should assume a more aggressiv policy, the contributions from that noble state the last year hav been in excess of the contributions from the state of Massachusetts, and even more than our receipts from all New England. It will be seen that our contributions are largely from the West and the Pacific states; and, at a recent meeting of the Board, it was understood to be the opinion of those present that the office of the society should be removed to Chicago, and that the officers should be elected from among our friends residing in that city; and, to this end, the President, Secretary, and Treasurer signified their readiness to withdraw from the field and giv our Western friends the helm of our gallant little ship. But whether the headquarters of the society are removed or not, the President, in the most positiv terms, declines to be a candidate for re-election.

The Secretary then attempted to read her report, but as she is suffering from a very unpleasant sore throat, she soon called upon a substitute, who tried hard to put herself in Miss Craddock's place, and read with much emphasis and feeling expression. With the exception of the business details this report is like Mr. Westbrook, D.D.'s. As the plaint of a Unitarian lamb which unexpectedly finds itself among some Infidel wolves, we print it:

SECRETARY'S REPORT FOR FISCAL YEAR NOVEMBER 1, 1890, TO NOVEMBER 1, 1891.

Mr. President, Fellow-Members of the American Secular Union, and Friends: Your Secretary takes pleasure in once more welcoming our little band of workers at their annual reunion; and she expresses the hope that, although we hav come to this Congress for business entirely, we may all of us be so ready to join heart and hand in the good cause, that the occasion may be one of more than ordinary profit and mutual strengthening.

At the close of last year's Congress, we found ourselvs charged with several things to attend to. Let us take up these matters first, before dealing with the work of the present year.

Perhaps the most important work of all laid out for the Board by the Congress was the promulgation of a manifesto on the Sunday Opening of the World's Fair. At the first meeting of the Board thereafter, held Dec. 14, 1890, Mr. T. B. Wakeman and Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., were appointed a committee to draft such a manifesto. At the second meeting of the Board, held March 2, 1891, these gentlemen announced that they had not been able to attend to the matter, but they promised to hav it ready to present at the following board meeting. There hav been several meetings of the Board called since then; but as Messrs. Wakeman and Foote hav not been present, not hav they sent us any draft for approval by the other members of the Board, we regret to say that we hav been unable to carry out the instructions of last year's Congress in this matter.

The Secretary was also instructed by last year's Congress to make a specialty of rousing the enthusiasm of auxiliaries. This she has faithfully endeavored to do, both by public appeal through the papers and by personal letters. She regrets to state that the results are far from commensurate with her efforts. The conviction is being forced on her that the present auxiliary system of the American Secular Union is an almost total failure. The auxiliaries chartered are for the most part mere paper organizations, and of little use to the National Society, either as financial or as moral supporters. After the charter fee of $5 has been paid in, the new auxiliary usually rests on its oars, so far as the National is concerned. At most, it may favor us with one or two letters afterward. Your Secretary has begged and plead with them to let us hav a quarterly report of the work done or attempted along the lines of state Secularization. This she has urged, not only through the Liberal papers, but by letter to every auxiliary with which she has corresponded this year, whether new or old. The result has been exactly six reports.

She has also reminded these societies, both through the newspaper and by personal letter, of their duty to support the National American Secular Union financially. She has suggested that five cents quarterly per member would not be found burdensome. A few—a very few—hav responded. The following is the result:

Highland Freethinkers' Society, Highland, Ill.....	$6 25
Boston Ingersoll Secular Society, Boston, Mass...	5 00
Massillon, O., Liberals, through Mrs. Jacob Pitts.	2 20
Total.....	$13 45

If our auxiliaries are of little help to the American Secular Union financially, they are of still less help in carrying on the work of state Secularization. In fact the work which these auxiliaries busy themselvs about seems to be chiefly: (1) That of an intellectual debating society, where a lecture denouncing the evils of Christian superstition is followed by similar comments from the members; (2) that of a labor reform club. Now, each of these kinds of work has its uses, but we respectfully submit that neither of them has to do with that state Secularization for which the auxiliary's charter was obtained. Too frequently, moreover, such an auxiliary complains bitterly of the persecution to which its members are subject for their "Infidel" views, and finds it "impossible" to interest outsiders in the work of state Secularization. But let us inquire as to how much persuasivness and sweetness and tact they hav put forth to win outsiders. Has their method of presenting the truths of Liberalism not been one rather of fierce, bitter denunciation, rather than of brief, tactful argument, calm reason, and gentle persuasion? Moreover, hav they at all striven to advertise our work? Hav they faithfully circulated our pamphlets? Hav they patiently sought to lead their orthodox acquaintances toward the standing-ground common to the wise and just of all isms—i. e., the almost universal desire for religious freedom? Hav they zealously endeavored to show that the American Secular Union is based upon the platform of mutual tolerance, and that it welcomes alike the churched and the unchurched of all isms to this common platform of religious freedom for all? Alas! we fear that in nearly every case the answer will be "No!" And for this reason also, your Secretary pronounces the auxiliary system of the American Secular Union, as at present conducted, not only a failure, but a real hindrance to the work of the National Society.

If we are to continue to hav auxiliaries, let us, by all means, hav the system thoroughly reorganized. At present, your Secretary is in exactly the position of the old Continental Congress. She may suggest quarterly contributions, but she has no authority to collect them. She may protest at the failure of auxiliaries to coöperate, but she has no power to make them choose between the alternativs of coöperation or expulsion. Let your Secretary, therefore, suggest the following plan:

Let us publicly announce that every auxiliary must fall into line with the following requirements within, say, three months after this Congress, or hav its charter revoked. Each auxiliary should agree to send in a quarterly report of work done or attempted for state Secularization; also quarterly contributions of, say, at least five cents per member. It should pledge itself to some work for the National American Secular Union each month. It should circulate our pamphlets, and hold rallies for state Secularization at stated periods; and a record of this work should appear on the quarterly report sent in to us. At the end of the designated three months, we should be authorized to publish a list of those auxiliaries who are on the roll of honor as willing to coöperate with us on the above basis; and we should be authorized to announce, then and there, the revocation of the charters of all other auxiliaries. Failure to comply with the quarterly report and quarterly contribution rule after, say, two successiv lapses, should warrant the Secretary in publishing the name of that auxiliary as having been stricken from our books. With some such method as this we might hope to see the auxiliary system of the American Secular Union before long established on a businesslike basis.

And now as to the work so far accomplished. When it is considered against what odds we hav struggled during the past year, with dissensions within the Board, a partially hostil press, and an almost wholly hostil fraternity of lecturers without, with a long line of non-members and non-contributors allowed free shot at us in the newspapers, and the consequent withholding of contributions by many of our people (who naturally thought these demonstrations an evidence of disapprobation by the American Secular Union members, instead of its being mainly the growling of irresponsible outsiders); when these set-backs are all considered, we cannot but congratulate ourselvs that we hav weathered the storm so successfully. And we want right here to thank those noble-hearted Liberals who hav come forward again and again with cheering letters and contributions of money during our months of trial. It was your encouragement, your substantial help, dear friends, which sustained us; and once more we thank you heartily.

It may not be amiss to briefly note some of the things accomplished during the past two years of our administration.

We hav written and issued four pamphlets, as follows: (1) "A Few Plain Words Regarding Church Taxation;" (2) "Shall the Bible Be Read in Our Public Schools?" both by President Westbrook. (3) "The Army of the American Secular Union," by your Secretary. (4) The "Flag and Pansy" leaflet, suggested by Mr. W. S. Andres, of Portsmouth, written by your Secretary, and slightly modified by the Board of Directors. It may not be improper to here mention that the entire expense of printing the "Army of the American Secular Union" was a donation from your Secretary. Of these pamphlets we hav circulated over four thousand copies of "Church Taxation;" two thousand copies "Shall the Bible Be Read in Our Public Schools?" one thousand copies "Army of the American Secular Union," and nearly five thousand copies of the "Flag and Pansy" leaflet. We could hav made use of three times as many had we not been so cramped for funds that we were frequently obliged to send fewer than we should otherwise hav done, and, in many cases, to refuse them altogether. We also printed and circulated one thousand "Official Announcements" during January and February, 1890. In addition, we hav sent out a varied assortment of other pamphlets, of which the Secretary has kept no special account—Remsburg's "Sabbath Breaking," Washburne's "Sunday and the Sabbath," fifty copies Reynolds's "Sunday Laws," "A Plea for Impartial Taxation," Stevens's "God in the State," "The Museums in the Park: Why they should be kept open on Sunday," etc., and a number of old copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, Freethought, Secular Thought, American Sentinel, Progressive Thinker, Freethinkers' Magazine, and other publications which advocate state Secularization. One thousand constitutions hav also been widely distributed; and we regret that lack of funds has prevented our distributing several thousands more.

During the past two years your Secretary has written for Freethought publications in the neighborhood of forty articles. She also delivered, by invitation, a lecture before the Newark Liberal League, of Newark, N. J., on "How to Make Freethinkers of the Young." She has also spoken twice, likewise by invitation, before the Friendship Liberal League of Philadelphia, once upon the occasion of Thomas Paine's birthday, and once upon the subject of the Bible in the public schools.

The Secretary's efforts to establish a Secular Penny Fund, somewhat after the order of the Peter's Pence in the Roman Catholic church, has been crowned with signal success—pennies, dimes, and even dollars pouring in from all over the country. If this were kept up as a regular habit by our Liberal friends, we should soon hav, at little expense to individuals, a fund which would enable us to do telling work to offset the efforts of the God-in-the-Constitution party. Estimating those opposed to the union of church and state (including children who are likely to be trained in the Liberalism of their parents) as only one in sixty-five—a confessedly low estimate—we should hav one million Liberals in the United States. If these gave each one cent yearly to the Secular Penny Fund, we should hav one million pennies, or ten thousand dollars. We trust that our Liberal friends will continue to remember the Secular Penny Fund, when they desire to help on a great good at but little expense to themselvs.

Of the work of your Secretary as correspondent, modesty forbids more than a passing mention, although that has been her chief duty. One must experience, in order to appreciate, the need of care in writing to so many correspondents of such widely differing beliefs as exist in our ranks. It is a work which calls for all the tact, sympathy, sincerity, and geniality that one can muster.

We feel safe in asserting that, under the present administration, the American Secular Union has opened up more lines of fellowship with workers in various religious denominations than has been the case for many years past. On the platform of the Portsmouth Congress, a Jewish rabbi and the secretary of the National Religious Liberty Association joined with us in two eloquent appeals for state Secularization. The Progressive Thinker—a Spiritualist paper with a large circulation, a paper which refuses charitable donations, and is thoroughly self-supporting—has been glad to become our organ among the Spiritualists, and has done a splendid work for us in interesting that large and influential body of Liberals. Indeed, it is to our Spiritualistic constituency that we chiefly owe our being tided over the financial distress of this summer.

Even the Christian Statesman, the organ of our God-in-the-Constitution opponents, we hav persuaded into not only treating us with courteous consideration, but into advertising our work in several leading editorials. The Unitarian press, also, while still fighting shy of us because of the fiercely denunciatory Atheism of some of our members, has begun to refer to us briefly, but favorably. A prominent Methodist paper has promised us a favorable notice of our work before long. Our Pennsylvania legislature, which we furnished gratis with our "Church Taxation" pamphlet, was quite stirred up by this same pamphlet. Only last week, the Philadelphia Press, in a front-page article, explained at length the injustice of exempting our churches, and gave the amounts of exemption—an article which would scarcely hav been possible two years ago. In a hundred and one silent, unobtrusiv ways such as these, the leaven of the American Secular Union is working among citizens of position and influence; and it does seem a pity that we should be so hampered as we hav been in the good work by the lack of funds.

Last, but not least, we hav our Prize Manual—"Conduct as a Fine Art"—a book which, while calculated to do effectiv work against the practice of Bible-reading in the public schools, John Wanamaker himself is glad to sell by the score over his counter, so just, so well written, so refined and scholarly in language and fair in treatment is the book.

And now as to what we ought to do in the future, if state Secularization and the habit of mental liberty are to become our permanent possessions.

First of all, I would emphasize the need of training the young as Freethinkers. Every Liberal club, every auxiliary of the American Secular Union ought to be the nucleus for a Freethought Sunday-school, where children shall be taught to recognize: (1) The evils of superstition; (2) the duty of an upright, clean, cheerful life, backed by such scientific training as will make them understand that evolution, and not special creation, is the law under which the universe works, and that all plants and animals are their cousins by blood descent of evolution; (3) the true explanation of the Bible as a curious collection of ancient myths, worthy, not of ignorant denunciation, but of the most scholarly study of the most advanced Liberalism; (4) the importance of enlistment in the army of the American Secular Union. This matter of making Freethinkers of the young I hav dealt with at length in the Freethinkers' Magazine for July of this year, so that I need not occupy your time with more than a passing mention of same, important as I consider this whole matter to be.

Lastly, as an aid both to Freethought work among the young and to our society's work of state Secularization, I recommend the publication of an organ of our own, to be called, say, the Secularist, or by any other appropriate title. That the American Secular Union should continue, as in the past, to rely entirely upon Atheistic and Materialistic papers for reaching the public, however ably these papers may be conducted, is absurd. Moreover, I consider it a violation of our constitution, which demands that we shall not favor any one sect above another. We hav no more right to favor Atheism than we hav to favor extreme Trinitarian Christianity. That we should adopt our loyal Spiritualistic helper, the Progressive Thinker, as our exclusiv organ, would likewise be a violation of the non-sectarian clause in our constitution. That we should make use of both does not meet the needs of the case. The Progressive Thinker is too activ a journal, and usually too full of its own matter to be able to publish our articles as promptly as is desirable; and some of the other papers hav more than once declined to publish certain of our communications at all. Moreover, we are likely to incur at any moment the adverse criticism of the latter over some petty detail. They hav, of course, an undeniable right to criticise us adversely, if so inclined, just as has any paper; but the journal which claims to be an organ of a society is supposed to be pledged to that society's support; and for hostil criticism to appear in its columns is, beyond question, a breach of good faith, not to say good taste. Since, then, we hav absolutely no true organ which fulfills our requirements, it must be evident that we need to establish one for ourselvs.

But, our friends will exclaim, to establish a paper will require thousands of dollars. Not necessarily.

At present we are a small society, weak financially, and there is no reason why we should branch out with an expensiv paper. What we need is simply an organ—an organ

God In the Constitution.

"God" in the Constitution is one of the subjects that are at present agitating the different minds of this country. That those persons of a religious turn of mind should sanction the attempts of the religious leaders to hav such a word inserted in the Constitution is a very natural consequence of contagious feelings. The opposition to such insertion, coming as it does from Freethinkers, Atheists, Infidels, and the like, is also a consequence of the natural laws of opposition to any infringement of the church on the rights of the state. The insertion of the word God in its Constitution at once displays the subservience of the state to the church, which is fanatically wrong from beginning to end. Man created religion, and he also created the state. Thus he created the two things as radically different from one another as a man is from a woman. If the religious adherents insist that "God" should be inserted in the Constitution, they may eventually insist that in every woman's name there shall be a man's name, and in every man's name a woman's name. For instance: Mary John Louise Harrison; Joseph Elizabeth Hemminway. Greater absurdities of religious fanaticism were never brought in the world to be swallowed by the intellectual throat. Granted that we should hav "God" in the Constitution. Well, what effect will it hav? What does it mean? Who is "God?" What kind of a thing is God? Where is God? What beneficial influence has that God got? What kind of a phraseology will it giv us? What will it be, or what is it, or what does it mean, to say "in the name of God?" Well, what name? Inserting such a word (as "God"), that has been so productiv of the most absurd nonsense and of so many crimes, will simply be another piece of legerdemain of the church—be "to look up" to the awfulness of that word, while she, the church, "will look down, and pick out from your purse the wealth therein contained." Now, the church is one thing and the state is another, a great, grand, and more noble thing. The state is there to suppress the crimes committed through the false doctrins taught by the church and not to besmirch itself with the church's bloody and criminal record. We want nothing else in the Constitution than words and names that mean something each, and by their grammatical connections will mean plenty, and mean, in every specific respect, things that everybody knows and understands. We want no mythological expression, example, or reference. We want facts and nothing else but facts, and we do not want the church to hav anything to say to us about those facts; nor even ever attempt to explain them to us. She is incompetent to explain daily facts. For centuries past she has taught us delusions, and now her time is up. The idea of parading the most important document that we hav, guaranteeing us our lives, our property, and our freedom, with a mythological expression that has been so many times evolved until it is now impossible to say wherefrom or how it has sprung, or what it represents or stands for, is an insult added to injury on humanity. The word has been every time used to signify fear when the recipient seemed to enjoy the spirit of investigation. It has been used as a "false pretense" to extort from the weak minds their will, consent, and worldly goods. It has never been used to any good advantage. The savage when he was told by the Christian minister that God had made Jesus die to save him, took up his club to waylay the minister. A murderer was about to hang; his priest told him to trust in God; he answered, "Yes, that's what I done, and here I am with a rope around my neck." When another murderer was about to be lynched, a minister was in the crowd to giv him the last comforts of religion; the minister advised him to fear nothing, that God would heal his soul; to which the murderer answered with a curse: "Your God and my soul! If there is a God, as you preach, let him heal my body now and I'll heal my soul myself." And there are millions of such examples. The business of the church being to look after and save souls, it consequently has no business here. Its place is where the souls are. Where they are they may hav some use for the preachers and the Gods, and most probably no use for any state or United States Constitution. Therefore, the church with its God in its Constitution, exit. We hav no regard whatever for the church nor for the pope down to the student of theology so long as they will persist in teaching such radically wrong doctrins. We hav no respect for the church, because it makes its principal object money under the disguise of an alleged religion that has absolutely no foundation to it. We entertain a perfect contempt for the church and its doctrins, because, while it preaches charity and the elevation of humanity, it surrounds itself with all the luxuries of this world, and sanctions crimes under its doctrins of absolution. We abhor the church because it prohibits the denial of its doctrins and inflicts cruel and relentless pains and ignominy for such supposed offense. We detest it because it is the worst enemy of scientific philosophy, barring every step of progress or investigation at any cost or consequence. We insist upon a most terrific opposition to the insertion of the churchly "God" in our Constitution, because it is an unqualified and daring attempt to once more cruelly arrogate to itself the government of the world as in ancient times, making serfs or slaves of us, keeping us in an abject state of slavery with the sword, blood, and fire if needs be. We protest against the insertion of that religious expression, because it means the weapon of the church's fraudulent practice and influence. We want to hav nothing to do with God or religion in our federal or state governments, and as an act of justice to one and all we insist that the church, its property and ministers, should be taxed as all the inhabitants of the same land are taxed. The taxation of the church is the amendment that we insist upon, and that should be inserted, practiced, and carried out all over the world. Jos. Maille.

PROTECTION.

While money may in reality affect the people's welfare to a greater extent than any or all other functions of government, yet in the minds of the people generally the idea of protection overshadows all others. By protection I do not mean that afforded home industries by a tariff on foreign goods. I shall take up that question later. The superstition of money is simply that it must be issued by government to secure its stability and value; but the idea of protection is supposed to form the basis and about the only excuse for government. We damn politicians, the administration, and the inefficiency of the laws, yet fall upon our knees in supine reverence before government whenever the wizard Protection waves his wand. The great mass of the people regard government much as the child feels for its parents—they want to be cared for, hav their whims gratified, their notions of morality and utility put into execution. Their government is infallible, or will be when they succeed in getting the proper officials elected. Yet protection often spoils the child. It is all-important to early inculcate a spirit of independence, a self-reliance. The greatest intellects of the world hav evolved from early self-dependence. Thrown upon their own resources they develop a strength of character impossible of attaining by the pampered child of protection. Protection is a fallacy. Prohibition has for its object the protection of the people by closing the saloons and thereby removing the temptation to drink. Yet true manhood is developed by meeting and resisting temptation. Almost all political measures hav protection as their chief advertisment, and yet it is the quality that damns them all, for it invariably defeats the object which the promoters hav in view. It is the reliance upon others—upon oaths and promises instead of asserting the will and independence of self—that makes failures of our temperance organizations. True independence must avoid such associations. Infants and unfortunates who cannot exercise their own faculties need and should receive protection; to others it is oftener a curse than a blessing. But there is another phase of protection. Men are supposed to hav rights and the strong arm of the law is needed to see that these rights are not invaded. Friends, I think a little study will convince you that men hav no rights which governments are bound to respect, much less protect. Matthew Arnold has said, "All rights are created by law and based on expediency, and are alterable as public advantage may require." It is the politician who is to decide what our rights are and whether it be expedient to allow us to exercise those rights. Government protects those only to whom it delegates power. It is not the laborer, it is not the great majority, that are protected. It is the capitalist. It is the man who toils not but relies upon his wealth to create more—the speculator, the landlord, and the lend lord that are protected. That is to say, government protects those in doing that which the humanity of man would never tolerate. Hence government protection is simply license. The protection the citizen feels is extended to him by government is merely a superstition identical with that which the Christian feels is extended to him by God. When we sit down to figure it out—to demonstrate its existence in some tangible form—we find no evidence apart from the assumption that everything that is to our benefit is the result of government. The principle of protection is not a motiv of government. Protection should defend the weak against the strong. Government upholds the strong in oppressing the weak. To be sure, it must be done on lines sanctioned by government. The highwayman or burglar will be punished if caught, provided he does not stand in with the officials. But the landlord is assisted to evict a poor tenant who may hav paid him in rent more than the value of his property. The forces of government rush to his aid in depriving a poor man of his home, who through misfortune is unable to comply with the conditions he was obliged to enter into in order to obtain a home, even though he has paid with interest more than the original debt. I want you to realize, if you can, that it is just as reprehensible to do wrong through the agency of government as through the independent action of individuals. Robbery is robbery, and doing it by a process of law and calling it protection in no way alters its essential qualities.

The idea of government protection arose, no doubt, from the fact that in the childhood of the race, while parents would protect their young, and tribes rush to the assistance of their comrades when attacked from foes of other tribes, internal strife was allowed until intelligence, born of warfare, suggested to the chiefs to interfere, hence their power—the first government—was directed to the control and regulation of internal affairs; not for the people's good, but for their own, to strengthen themselvs by regulating and training their slaves; and as government has evolved from the will of one man to that of many, this principle became the mainspring of the institution. Self-preservation is said to be the first law of nature, and is as applicable to institutions as to individuals, and the selfishness of governments is even more apparent than that of individuals, inasmuch as individuals progress in sympathy, charity, and all kindly feelings, while government is a soulless institution and ever at a standstill. I want you to consider this point; it is the most important in my arraignment of government. It is to the individual, and individual enterprise, that I would appeal. It is organized individual enterprise that must take the place of government, and I want you to distinguish the difference between this and government. There is so much confusion of thought on the subject. Because a free association has an organization, officers, and rules of conduct, the assumption is put forth with the utmost confidence that they are identical, and yet there is all the difference between the two that there is between liberty and slavery. The right of eminent domain, the corner-stone of government, would be unknown in a free association. Compulsory taxation, the basis of all government, could never be in a free society. State sovereignty, the all in all of government, could hav no meaning in a state of free individuals organized for mutual interests. And in such an association we might hope for protection on the only plan that protection could be honorably accepted, mutual and reciprocal. It would not be government, but individual, protection. In such a state all sovereignty would reside in the individual; all taxation would be voluntarily and cheerfully paid, because it would be for value received. It is a fallacy to claim that men would object to being assessed to pay for actual benefit. Our mutual benefit associations demonstrate that men cheerfully pay for others' benefit to secure their own, not only contribute their money but devote their time and energy in building up and furthering the enterprise, the officers generally working for nothing but the pleasure it affords them. Who will assert that these, or like organizations, might not include in their systems all the functions important to society, without any of the authority or compulsion of government? No law affecting the people but natural law; no officials absorbing the earnings of the laborer, excepting the few whose office requires their continued presence—these might be generously paid for their time.

I do not care to enter into any details of any system of voluntary association; I merely wish to direct your thoughts toward such organization. I believe it is entirely practicable for local organizations to perform all necessary functions of society which hav been usurped by government and turned to the interests of one class.

Our novelists hav turned their attention to building up the future republic, the future commonwealth. They hav drawn some beautiful pictures, and given us the benefit of much sound reason, but I fear there are many principles of human economy they hav not taken into consideration. Human nature is a complicated affair, and it is much easier to build up human institutions on paper, and dispose of individuals like the figures upon a chess-board, than it is to move them in real life. To my mind all such forecasts are failures. It is a waste of time, striving to rend the vail of the future. It is better to study the history of the past than to fancy events of the future. Let us work in the here and the now. Let us study human nature and draw from thence true principles of action. There is one feature we may safely predicate of human nature, and any movement which fails to fully appreciate and provide for this feature must fail of accomplishing any real benefit, and this is liberty, the basis of all true economy.

Trust liberty, as a plant 'twill spring
And thrive in any soil;
And nurtured it will surely bring
The just reward of toil.

Trust liberty, 'twill enrich the soil
The more its growth we guard;
The more we in its harvest toil,
The more is our reward.

Wrong and Wretched.

O for a lodge in some vast wilderness,
Some boundless contiguity of shade,
Where rumor of oppression and deceit,
Of unsuccessful or successful war,
Might never reach me more!—Cowper.

So wrote this fine poet; and so must still feel the finest specimens of our race. The lover of peace must be the lover of purity, since the least thought perceives that only the latter can secure the former. In his earlier life Cowper looked to Christianity for relief—to reform oppressions, to transform swords into plowshares and spears into pruning-hooks. Sadly disappointed in its hoped-for results, he grew disheartened and lost his faith, as he finally had to his health and life. Lamentably, hundreds of, may we not say, the nobler specimens of our kind, from the same causes are going the same way. Their logic and their common sense oblige them to judge the tree by its fruit. Neither our great statesmen, orators, or authors hav been or are now getting to be members of orthodox churches. Chief-Justice Taney, who ruled that colored men had no rights that white men were bound to respect, was a Catholic, while from Washington down to Lincoln rarely do we find a general, president, jurist, or distinguished statesman a church-member. Christianity as found in the churches, with the single Quaker exception, neither discouraged nor withstood our late intestin war. Instead of beating swords into plowshares and spears into pruning-hooks, they put them to the slaughter of their fellow-citizens and their own church-members!!! Even now we hav churches of the same creeds labeled "North" and "South." Are these, or indeed the Christian system in general, bringing peace on earth and good will to men?

The prevailing orthodox answer is, that though not just now, the tree will in time bear the good fruit. The early disciples it seems looked hourly for the return of their savior, as his promis was left them. Large Christian denominations hav continued so to look from that day to this. So, confiding in the promis and the prophets, they hav at times sold out their goods or distributed them freely, broken up housekeeping, repaired to their churches, and, full of expectation, hav watched for their savior's advent, even by night, more intensely than do the Methodists watch out the old for the new year. And yet all seems to fail. Instead of the good fruit coming it seems to be going. The faith and the churches are evidently waning. Since actions speak louder than words and nothing succeeds like success, promises and theories can no longer keep up Christian courage and prosperity.

As our dreadful war closed the big financial question and efforts were made to raise greenbacks to par value by resuming specie payments, as the discussion on the modus operandi protracted, Mr. Greeley would persist in saying, "The way to resume is to resume." So is our world of thought saying the way to remove "deceit, oppression, and war" is to do it. Promises and hopes are threadbare coming to rags, while according to the Quaker practical life, we must at once refrain from these terrible wrongs, or with Cowper, long for a vast wilderness for a refuge.

The immediate commencement of the remedy may be at hand. The good, the peaceful instruction into the Cowper sentiment may at once begin in the home and school. Years ago I argued with teachers that the rod was out of place in the school-room. As the old dispensation had passed I suggested that Solomon's "Spare the rod and spoil the child" should go with it. As the use of the rod and other barbarous, violent methods had neither improved or preserved our children, nothing could be lost by laying it aside for at least a trial. Not long after this the school board of Nashville, the Oxford of the South, prohibited its use as a punishment for not getting the lesson. Next Chicago took the longer step of total prohibition. In each case reports show improvement in the pupils.

In Barton county, Mo., I had occasion some twelve years ago to spend a week in one of her villages. A non-pretentious gentleman had taken charge of their school, spending part of the first day reasoning the pupils out of the rod. So long in the minds of their non-progressiv parents had it been associated with the school that they could see no way of conducting a school without it. But while casting about, lingering to find some way to dismiss their teacher, their children began more and more to respect him and keep order. Nearly through the term when I visited his school, I was more than gratified at his unprecedented success.

The rod upon the back can never improve the mind or the heart, but must be displaced by appeals to reason and sentiment. Let this be done by home and school education, till no more must we say in Cowper's continued lines:

My ear is pained,
My soul is sick with every day's report
Of wrong and outrage with which earth is filled.
There is no flesh in man's obdurate heart—
It does not feel for man; the natural bond
Of brotherhood is severed as the flax
That falls asunder at the touch of fire.

Read "The Task."

To this I may add that, displacing the idea that might gives right by the principle of reason and kindness, it is unwise to stop at the half-way house. Since the capacity and merits of lower animals are being learned, the principle must be extended to them. As Bergh earned the respect of all good people by organizing societies in our cities to respect them, so is George T. Angel in Boston, by educating children, women, and men to treat them so as to need no legal protection. An ounce of prevention outweighs in merit a pound of cure. Professor Garner, by the aid of Edison's phonograph, is learning the language of the higher species of the falsely so-called dumb animals.

In another issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER it will be my pleasure to submit an article on this new step in science. At present I conclude with Byron's poem:

INSCRIPTION ON THE MONUMENT OF A NEWFOUNDLAND DOG.

When some proud son of man returns to earth,
Unknown to glory, but upheld by birth,
The sculptor's art exhausts the pomp of woe,
In storied urns records who rest below.
When all is done, upon the tomb is seen,
Not what he was, but what he should hav been:
But the poor dog, in life the firmest friend,
The first to welcome, foremost to defend,
Whose honest heart is still his master's own,
Who labors, fights, lives, breathes for him alone,
Unhonored falls, unnoticed all his worth,
Denied in heaven the soul he held on earth;
While man, vain insect! hopes to be forgiven,
And claims himself a sole exclusiv heaven.

O man! thou feeble tenant of an hour,
Debased by slavery or corrupt by power,
Who knows thee well must quit thee with disgust,
Degraded mass of animated dust.
Thy love is lust, thy friendship all a cheat,
Thy smile hypocrisy, thy words deceit!
By nature vile, ennobled but by name,
Each kindred brute might bid thee blush for shame.

Ye who perchance behold this simple urn,
Pass on: it honors none you wish to mourn.
To mark a friend's remains these stones arise;
I never knew but one, and here he lies.

Theosophy as It Is Expounded by Mrs. Besant.

From the London Standard.

Mrs. Besant delivered a lecture last evening on "Theosophy and Occultism."

Mrs. Besant stated that Theosophy came forward as holding the spiritual as opposed to the material conception of the universe, but declaring that it might be justified to the intellect and demonstrated to the reason. Humanity asked for something more than the outcome of Agnosticism, which was that man climbed upward to fall back in the end; and in response to this demand Theosophy came with its message of life and immortality, showing that the universe was, indeed, a spiritual universe, that man was essentially spirit, and that that spirit was immortal, eternal, and imperishable, as well as uncreated. It said to Agnostic science: "Man is an organism evolving new powers, new sciences, new things for investigation, and what you call 'unknowable' is only unknowable to many to-day, but which has been already investigated by a few, and is not beyond the reach of those who dare to tread an unknown path." Having pointed out that the distinction between Theosophy and occultism was that the latter was a branch of Theosophy which belonged to the more advanced in Theosophic science, Mrs. Besant added that, beyond this, Theosophy alleged that there were different planes of life, thought, and being—namely, the physical, or lower planes, and the spiritual, or higher planes, the latter being denominated "astro," "passional," "mental," and so on. The lecturer referred at length to the evidences furnished by cases of hypnotism, clairvoyance, etc., of the existence of a spiritual or will power capable of moving matter, and went on to contend that what Theosophists regarded as the higher planes were eternal and imperishable.

She also stated that one of the doctrins of Theosophy was that of reincarnation, it being held that the eternal spirit came to the earth, incased itself in the human form, gathered human knowledge through the education of life, and when death arrived, and the body was worn out, the immortal principle of higher intelligence, or the spirit of man, passed through a period of rest, and then returned once more to earth with the experience already gathered, entering upon a new course of human life; thus constantly accumulating mental and moral capacities by an evolution as natural and orderly as the physical evolution, and one that was necessary to explain the differences in the intelligence and morality of man. Theosophy, she said, further held that there was a mental and moral as well as a physical heredity, and that there was a principle termed Karma, which meant that as humanity sowed so must it reap.

At the close of the lecture a number of questions, written by members of the audience and handed to the chairman, were answered by Mrs. Besant, whose replies may be summarized as follows: The explanation of how man's want of all recollection of a previous state of existence was to be reconciled with a belief in a future state of existence was, roughly, that the brain memory belonged to a transient personality. To the question whether there was any knowledge derived from ascertained facts accessible to inquirers in proof of the doctrin of reincarnation, the answer was contained in the suggestion furnished by the immense differences, morally and intellectually, between human beings, the divergences often existing in the case of twins; the numerous cases of infant genius, in which there was knowledge such as could not hav been acquired in the present state of existence. In reply to the question, "Are beasts reincarnated, and if not, why not?" the answer was that the reincarnating principle passed through all the lower stages of existence, including the mineral, the plant, and the brute, up to man; that this was a process of differentiation, and that gradually this principle, which was general and universal, became individualized as the physical apparatus became suitable for the manifestation. The reply to the question, "Does not Theosophy destroy the intuition implanted by God in every individual?" was that it did not destroy, but rather trained that faculty. A question as to the origin and use of evil was broadly that evil was the persistence of the lower or brute nature in the lower planes of humanity. As to individual mind, origin, that was derived from the universal mind, which, like light, pervaded the universe. With regard to the period of reincarnation, that varied according to the stage of evolution reached by the individual. In reference to prayer, Theosophists did not believe in prayer to any object outside humanity; she preferred to put it, not as prayer, but as the aspiration of a lower to a higher life. As to the theory of a personal God, if by this were meant an extra-cosmic God, distinct from the universe, and yet infinit, so unphilosophic a conception was not part of the Theosophic theory. With reference to love, Mrs. Besant stated that she regarded love as the great moving force of the world, but it needed wisdom to prevent its doing harm.

The Heretics.

Who are these heretics, and what do they want? They want to elevate society, they desire to improve the world morally, they want vice to be considered vice, and virtue virtue. They are looked upon by some as monsters, but they hav been, and are to-day, some of the world's best men of thought and some of the world's greatest improvers and civilizers. Men who were heretics in their time hav become the saints of to-day, and many of the Infidels of to-day will be regarded as men of the noblest thoughts, deepest convictions, and loftiest ideas in time to come. Look at the careers of the Adlers, the Ingersolls, the Paines, and the men of that type and you will learn that they all worked for liberty and equality; that they spoke words only that aimed at the improvement of the home life; that they pleaded for a religion of happiness, and held that the end and aim of all life was happiness.

Thomas Paine, who had the courage to withstand the attacks and rebuffs of the entire church, was wise enough to proclaim, "The world is my country, to do good is my religion." I adopt Paine's mode of thought, for he believed in one God and hoped for immortality and broke to pieces whatever seemed to him irrational. I do not adopt the mode of thought of the ethical culturist and the man who denies not nor affirms not the existence of a God, but then I can giv them their proper standing and can accord to them whatever of value attaches itself to their name, because of the good they are doing to mankind at large. We Jews, too, hav had men who in their time were branded with the sneering jibe of "heretic," men whom we are proud to own to-day. According to the ideas of many rabbis to-day there are some ministers in the pulpit who deserve to be nailed with that appellation, because they hold themselvs free to choose whatever of ethics there is in the Bible and discard whatever is grotesque, absurd, irrational, and immoral. We hav recently heard of several trials in the Christian church of men who hav been arraigned for heresy. The church may put a dark veiling around the word and besmirch its meaning, but then the man who is bent upon some noble mission ought never to care if he be thus branded.—Rabbi Schanfarber, Baltimore.

We hope that whenever a Freethinker sees an article in his local paper in favor of opening the World's Fair on Sundays he will mark it and send a copy to Benjamin Butterworth, secretary Board of Directors of World's Fair, Rand-McNally building, Chicago, Ill., and to John T. Dickinson, secretary National Commission of World's Fair, at the same address. Let us make a vigorous and persistent fight in this matter. Our efforts must not slacken till the final decision is made, which may not be till 1893.

To the Friends and Subscribers of Freethought.

I sincerely hope that all who hav supported Freethought in the past will aid the work to which it has been devoted by becoming subscribers to The Truth Seeker. The Truth Seeker will carry on the work, but it needs your coöperation. It is a means by which I can reach you and push on the Pacific coast labors. Especially I ask those in arrears to pay what is now due to The Truth Seeker and place their names upon its list as cordial supporters for the future. Samuel P. Putnam.

The Bible Picture Book, we take pleasure in saying, is now under way, and will be issued as soon this fall as the work can be done and done well. The price will be $1, and it will contain a great deal for that amount. In renewing for The Truth Seeker we hope our readers will not forget to inclose the dollar for it.

An Attempted Revival of Bigotry.

How little the Christians care for any law which conflicts with their own desires is seen by the attempt to restore the Bible to the public schools of Wisconsin, notwithstanding the decision that its use is unconstitutional. The claim of the Christians now is that by keeping the Bible out of the schools the foundations of Infidelity will be laid.

The Progressiv Age, which brings the news, thinks that the clergymen who are responsible for the new movement pass but a sorry compliment upon the influence of the home, Sunday-school, and the church, when they aver that excluding the Bible from an institution that is not engaged in theological or anti-theological teaching, can wreck the commonwealth in a Christian civilization. How, it asks, will the public schools lay the foundation for Infidelity when they leave untouched the subject of religion? If the church with its zealous ministry, and the Sunday-schools with their thousands of activ workers, and the myriad of homes in this country, cannot save the people from Infidelity, it is a clear case establishing the inefficiency of Christian institutions of the country, and indeed it amounts to an impeachment of Christianity as interpreted by the followers of Christ.

We do not think that even the ministers would claim that the commonwealth would be wrecked by Infidelity. What they fear is that they themselvs would be out of a job in the next generation if the children are not taught to be religious, which means, when interpreted, to support the preachers. Unless children are brought up to do this as a duty not to be neglected, they will be apt to neglect it. Reverence for the Bible must be preserved, which leads to a reverence for its expounders, and although but few men nowadays account the minister as of much importance, yet early training compels his support as one of the institutions of society. In the country even, where but little is heard of theological progress and where the old traditions are powerful, the population is divided into men, women, and the ministers, while the contributions are regularly made and the pew-rents paid. It is to train the children in the same ruts that the effort to put the Bible back into the schools is made. It is for the protection of a business. The clergy conceive themselvs to hav vested interests which were disturbed by the recent decision of the Wisconsin supreme court.

The clergy, however, seem to learn little and to profit nothing by the lessons of history. When this country was settled church and state were united. The clergy owned the towns. A man must be a church-member before he could vote. The minister was the magistrate's keeper. Tithes were collected by law. Scoffers at the clergy were punished as blasphemers. People who did not attend church were fined. Sabbath-breakers were put in the stocks. The clergy had a monopoly of Sunday and fenced it around with impassable restrictions. The people were practically their slaves.

After a while the people objected. The Baptists objected to supporting the Congregational church. The Quakers were tired of being whipped and hanged. It got so that a man could vote even if he did not go to church. The minister was pushed off the magistrate's bench. The people found out that the clergyman was not God. Then once in a while they took a walk on Sunday, and were not struck dead. So they separated church and state and filed the decree of divorce in their state constitutions. All they left to the preachers is a few Sunday laws, an occasional blasphemy law, and the Bible in the schools. But the sects fought, and so sectarianism was forbidden in state institutions. This pleased the clergy until it was found by the Wisconsin court that the Bible itself is sectarian, and must go, when they announce their determination to restore the old order of things in that state. Simultaneously their brethren all over the country clamor for the enforcement of the Sunday laws. It is the beginning of an effort to bring back colonial days, and it is in making such an effort, and in thinking it practicable or even possible, that the clergy show poor judgment. Temporarily they may get the Bible into the schools; spasmodically they may enforce a Sunday law, but the great mass of the people hav gone away beyond those days and will not submit with patience to their recall. The clergy now should accept what they get and be thankful. They should go along quietly and unobtrusivly, for if they make too much noise and call attention to themselvs too violently the people will finish the work our ancestors begun, and let the ministerial tubs stand entirely upon their own bottoms—with no Sunday laws and no Bible in the schools. The tendency is most certainly that way.

The Servitude of Catholic Priests.

A few years ago a considerable stir was made as to the rightfulness or wrongfulness, from a social political-economy standpoint, of private ownership of land. Strangely enough, a Catholic priest became interested in the question, and because he rejected the traditional view he was incontinently ejected from his church. Expelling Dr. McGlynn, however, did not close the discussion, and the head of the Catholic church, one Mr. Pecci, P.P., of Rome, Italy, has published what is called an encyclical—that is, a letter to a great many—defining the position of the church on the question of private ownership of land.

Mr. Henry George, being the gentleman who contributed largely to the agitation resulting in Dr. McGlynn's dismissal from service, felt it incumbent upon himself to answer Mr. Pecci, and show how private ownership of land, in the ordinary sense, is all wrong, but becomes all right when the rental value is taken as taxes. But the merits of this controversy between Mr. Pecci and Mr. George are not pertinent to these observations. That to which we are now calling attention is the abject servitude of the priests to Mr. Pecci, as representativ of the Catholic church.

The Rev. Mr. Ducey, Roman Catholic priest, is a friend to Dr. McGlynn and also to Mr. George. When Mr. Pecci's encyclical and Mr. George's reply were before the public a daily newspaper of this city sought and obtained the views of various priests as to who beat in the dispute, and afterward sought the opinion of Father Ducey—though there is no evidence that Mr. Ducey, like too many priests, is a father in other than a spiritual sense—upon these views, which may be learned from Mr. Ducey's reply to the reporter's interrogatories, as follows:

"If the reports in this day's Herald are correctly given I am very much pained with the interview. They place the enlightening authority of the great Catholic body in an ignorant and ridiculous position. My own opinion on reviewing the articles in the Herald is this: A writes an article, B answers A's article; C, D, F, et al. are asked their opinion about A and B, and they answer, A is right because we think so. B is a fool for daring to hav any opinion of his own.

"These gentlemen are placing the authority of the Catholic church in a false position, and the Catholic body will regret their presumption. I respect the utterances of the head of my church. I do not think I can in good judgment, good sense, or good taste assume the position of an interpreter or a critic of the holy father. Mr. George is not a member of my church. I hav not had time to study Mr. George's answer to the encyclical of the holy father. I shall read and study it as soon as possible. If I find good and perfect thoughts in Mr. George's writings I shall thank God for it, and I shall utilize these thoughts for God's honor and glory and the happiness of my fellow-men."

Mr. Pecci, as head of the Roman Catholic church, keeps assistants all around—a sort of foremen to boss the common workers—and in this city his foreman is Archbishop Mike Corrigan, son of a Newark liquor-dealer. Mr. Corrigan was displeased with this flippant reference to the pope as "A," which letter is on a level with "B," meaning Mr. George, and also with "C," "D," "F," etc., meaning some comparativly unimportant priests, and he told a reporter that "if Father Ducey had thought for an instant of the character of the encyclical he would hav avoided the error he committed. He seems," added Michael, "for the moment to hav lost sight of the fact that the holy father is the teacher, and every Catholic must regard him as the supreme earthly authority. The holy father having advanced in the encyclical the doctrin of private property in land, it became the duty of everyone in the church to accept it unquestioningly. There is no other view to be taken, no matter what any man may write. It is just like a well-established doctrin laid down in the holy scriptures, and it is to be followed just as closely and unquestioningly by all those who believe in the holy church."

So Michael called Mr. Ducey up to the desk and told him he could take back what he said about "A" and the other letters of the alphabet or he could put on his hat and coat and follow Mr. McGlynn out into the cold world. And Mr. Ducey thereupon got down upon his marrowbones and wrote this communication to the newspaper which interviewed him:

"To the Editor of the Herald: I am informed by the most reverend archbishop of New York, under whose administration and jurisdiction I serve as a priest of the Catholic church, hat so much of my interview as was published in the Herald of Oct. 20, 1891, has been interpreted as disrespectful to the authority of the holy see, and that in the illustration A, B, C, D et al., A was the holy father and B a gentleman who has answered the holy father.

"I greatly regret to receive this information, and I deem it my duty as a matter of self-respect and honor to correct the fault and wrong attributed to me.

"Did I not hav perfect loyalty to the holy see and to the authority of the archbishop of New York, who holds his authority and jurisdiction through and from the holy see, I would not consent to hold my position for an instant. I refused to say any word in judgment or criticism on the holy father's letter, and I believed I had so expressed myself to your reporter.

"The holy father is the head of my church and I am his subordinate officer. I refused to pass judgment on the gentleman who answered his letter for the reason that he is not a member of the Catholic church. I emphatically disclaim that I intended A to mean the holy father and B to mean a gentleman who might answer any utterance of the holy father. As a Catholic and a priest I must accept and recognize the holy father as the authorized teacher of the faith and morals committed to the church by Jesus Christ.

"I could not think of placing any person in a position of parallel authority and dignity with the head of my church, for this would be to set up an anti-pope in the place of God's appointed teacher. The most reverend archbishop has directed me to send this communication to your paper, and I do so most willingly for the purpose of correcting any misinterpretation of my interview.

"I trust you will giv this letter the same prominence in the Herald that you gave to my interview published in your paper October 20th. Thomas I Ducey.

"October 24, 1891. Rector of St. Leo's church."

Michael is now satisfied. Mr. Pecci also may be presumed to be placated. The incident shows that the gang of laborers for the Roman Catholic church is well in hand, and can be controled to any extent. From an administrativ standpoint the discharge of Dr. McGlynn was wise. THE TRUTH SEEKER remarked at the time that the archbishop would shortly hav every priest in the diocese on the ground licking the dust from his boots, as representativ of the pope, and the retirement of Priest Birdsall to a country parish and the abject humbling of Mr. Ducey prove us to hav been a prophet. There are no cakes and ale for a priest outside his church, and cakes and ale are favorit food with the Roman Catholic clergy.

Promis and Performance.

The people who paid the money for the prizes for the Manual of Morals published with a slight reference to the American Secular Union in its preface, desired a book which should "instruct children and youth in the purest principles of morality without inculcating religious doctrins," and the committee promised such a book. On page 142 is this:

"With Wordsworth we join in the petition:
"'To humbler functions, awful Power!
I call thee: I myself commend
Unto thy guidance from this hour;
Oh, let my weakness hav an end!
Giv unto me, made lowly wise,
The spirit of self sacrifice;
The confidence of reason giv;
And in the light of truth thy Bondman let me liv.'"

On page 154, by another author than the one who quoted Wordsworth, is this definition of honor: "My good boy is truthful not because he is afraid of the penalty that might follow if he were detected in a lie, but because he loathes a lie with his whole soul: the very thought of it makes his lip curl with scorn."

The good boy's lips are not the only lips which curl.

Is There Such a Thing?

Is there such a thing as an honest editor of a religious paper? The Independent says that the saying, "There is no good Indian but a dead Indian," is "an Infidel cry."

Which is a lie.

The Christian Advocate says of James Parton that "his religious principles were not settled."

Which is another and abominable perversion of the truth. James Parton was a settled Infidel. He knew just what he thought and believed and knew on the subject of religion.

Diogenes would certainly avoid the sanctums of religious journals were he to continue his search to-day.

We hope that whenever a Freethinker sees an article in his local paper in favor of opening the World's Fair on Sundays he will mark it and send a copy to Benjamin Butterworth, secretary Board of Directors of World's Fair, Rand McNally building, Chicago, Ill, and to John T. Dickinson, secretary National Commission of World's Fair, at the same address. Let us make a vigorous and persistent fight in this matter. Our efforts must not slacken till the final decision is made, which may not be till 1893.

THE Wellington Monthly Record and Review relates that in a New Zealand court lately, a boy of thirteen refused to recognize the Bible provided for witnesses. He could not undertake to speak the truth unless sworn on a particular version. A copy was hard to find, but at last a perspiring official entered bearing a ponderous family Bible, with plates, notes, and the rest of the extraneous rubbish to be found in the volumes hawked round by the book fiend—and then the fastidious child was able to testify, with a clear conscience, that he knew nothing about the matter before the court. In recording this exceptional exhibition of ignorance and bigotry, a contemporary remarks (surely in sarcasm) that the boy's conscientious scruples did honor to his training. The silliness of using a "holy" book in courts is farther shown by another paragraph in the same journal. In a gold-field township in the south, it is recorded no Bible at all could be found, and the court copy had gone amissing. Time being precious, a volume of interest tables was rushed in, and did duty, none of the witnesses having the curiosity to open the book. As the Bible of the commercial world, it was not without a certain fitness where civil issues were involved. A still stranger instance is among the traditions of the magistrate's court in Wellington. For many years all the oaths were taken on an old Johnson's dictionary. It was all through an absurdly sensitiv witness, who declared that no oath could bind him unless there was a cross on the book. It so happened that the court Bible and dictionary were similar in size and outward form—both bound in red calf, old, shabby, and ink-splashed. The clerk hastily took the book—the wrong one, of course—bound it with red tape arranged crosswise, like a parcel by registered mail, sealed it securely, and the deponent was satisfied. Succeeding witnesses could not open the volume, even if they so desired, and for twelve or fourteen years—until the tape wore out and gave way—it answered every purpose.

News and Notes.

Stockton is quite a banner town of Liberalism when once the forces are in motion. The meetings here hav been successful. The hall has been crowded, and extensiv reports hav been published in the daily papers, which add much more to the influence of the lectures. The Liberal League of Stockton is one of the oldest in the country. Its Paine celebrations hav been remarkable for their popularity. The League has given $500 worth of excellent scientific and Liberal books to the public library. These books were not only well received, but the city council passed a vote of thanks for the valuable gift.

I gave the first two lectures in Turn Verein Hall. The Turn Vereins here are radical, and do not propose to be under the surveillance of the church. When the Fourth of July comes on a Sunday they celebrate it with eclat. While they hav no objection to the Christians attending prayer-meeting, they themselvs wander off to the delightful picnic on the venerable day of the sun. They heartily respond to all the demands of Liberalism.

There was a little debate at the end of the second lecture. The Rev. Mr. Cuddy is a free lance Christian. He does not belong to any church. He repudiates the "Rev." I believe he calls himself Evangelist simply. He is not quite orthodox—for he agrees with me on the Sunday question, and opposes chaplaincies and also any union of church and state. At the time when he was chaplain of the legislature of Arizona a few years ago he achieved a national reputation by refusing the salary attached to his position. I guess he is the only chaplain who ever prayed for nothing when he could get wages for it, so I think he is honest in his religious views. I lectured on the Bible, and he did not accept my criticisms. He thought I did not sufficiently study the context. The "context" is the favorit refuge of the theologians when they hav a hard text to tackle. When I quoted "Blessed be ye poor!" Mr. Cuddy said it was not so, but "poor in spirit." I told him the "poor in spirit" text was in Matthew, while the text I quoted was in Luke, just as I gave it, and taught the blessing of poverty. It seems my friend has not searched the scriptures thoroughly. The debate added to the interest of the lecture. It threw in the side-lights, which are always attractiv in a discussion. The large audience evidently enjoyed the conflict of opinion, which was carried on without any bitterness of spirit.

The name of Stockton now floats upon every wind under the whole heavens, for one of the greatest feats of history has occurred on its splendid race course. Sunol has beaten the record at 2.08¼. It was on the kite-shaped track, which, it is understood, is more favorable than the regulation circular course; but I guess Sunol will stand to his record on any track. Stockton has one of the finest race-courses on the continent. The kite-shaped track and the circular cross each other, and the road is simply elegant. This is the only kite-shaped track in the country, I understand, with the exception of the one at Independence, Iowa. I had the pleasure of going over this track with Mr. J. C. Gage, and of looking upon that marvel of horse flesh, Sunol. But Sunol is now surpassed by Arion a two-year-old, who broke the world's record at 2:14½ This beats Sunol's two-year-old record. Arion could not be bought to-day for $100,000. Bellbird also broke the world's yearling record a 2 26¼ All three of these magnificent horses are at Stockton, and I had a good look at them; also Palo Alto and Stamboul, through the kindness of Mr. W. H. Parker, the owner of Commander, a horse of the same breed as the Electioneer. Stockton rivals the world with its tournament of noble horses, and the bright air of California seems to be an exhilarating tonic to the flying coursers.

Stockton also is destined to be the Minneapolis of the coast. Two of the greatest valleys in the world stretch away on either side of it—the Sacramento valley, two hundred miles to the north, and San Joaquin valley, two hundred miles to the south. There are large lumber mills at Stockton and the biggest flour mill in the state, that of the Farmers' Union. It is an imposing structure, and from its top a splendid extent of country is open clear to the glittering mountains a hundred miles away. The capacity of this mill is three thousand barrels a day. It can be increased to five and six thousand barrels. With W. F. Freeman and the superintendent, Mr. Cook, I examined its new and ponderous machinery, doing work as delicately as a lady's finger and sweeping on like the power of an earthquake. This vast building, with its outfit, cost $200 000. Beside this mill are the Crown mills, with a capacity of fifteen hundred barrels, and the Sperry mills, with a capacity of two thousand.

Saturday, W. F. Freeman drove me out to West Winery, a big establishment for the production of California wines. Through the politeness of Mr. West, Jr., I saw in this vast factory the grapes distilled into sparkling juice. Already this year they hav taken in three thousand tons of grapes. The grapes are shipped from as far as Fresno to this point. The prices are from eight to ten dollars a ton. This is an "off year," I understand, for the grapes and most of the fruits of California. The quantity is not so large, nor the quality so good, as usual. The wheat crop, however, is immense. Boats and ships are also built at Stockton. Maurice Freeman and his "pard," Harry Baldwin, hav just completed a little boat, made mostly with a jackknife and some other tools, and it presents a beautiful appearance upon the waters, and sweeps gaily and proudly on. It was launched October 24th—memorable epoch. Long may it wave!

Stockton goes in for natural gas. Large quantities are in the neighborhood, and quite a number of companies are formed for its development. It makes fuel and light cheap, and will undoubtedly be a great aid to the industries of the place.

I was pleased to meet with Dr. Hudson. He has written quite a number of historical and philosophical works. He is about to publish a book, "No Design in Life." It is quite interesting in its outlines and illustrations. The doctor is a Spiritualist, but he agrees with myself that God and religion are of no use to humanity. As a member of the California senate, and in other capacities, the doctor has done a great deal for political justice in this state. He is a keen and progressiv thinker. His book takes a line of thought not yet developed in Liberal literature.

The Freemans always giv a welcome to the Infidel lecturer and make the hours flow merrily along. Their daughter is winning a brilliant position upon the stage. Like Bennett, Mr. and Mrs. Freeman hav been "around the world" and looked with Infidel eyes upon the sacred and ancient places of the East, and penetrated its mysteries with the wisdom of this world.

Mr. and Mrs. J. C. Gage are always ready with "open house." Their daughter, Miss Julia, is a remarkable musician, and is studying the art with enthusiasm at San Francisco. Mr. Gage used to advertise on the front of his business place, $50 for a Christian. Many were the applicants, but when the test according to Mark from the open Bible was given to them they incontinently disappeared. They did not want to drink poison or handle snakes. Mr. Gage has still his $50. The genuin disciple is not to be found.

The Public Library of Stockton is an excellent institution. It is open on Sundays. Mr. Gower, the librarian, allows books of all opinions upon the shelvs. The Freethought books are there as well as others. The battle of ideas goes on beneath these literary ambuscades. Mr. Gower believes in a fair field and no favor.

My friend T. L. Grigsby, of Napa, is here with "The City of Babylon," the great and ancient city in miniature. It is quite a vivid representation of that old-time splendor. The tower, the palaces and hanging gardens, are presented with picturesque effect.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Haas and family, Mr. and Mrs. Jones, George Hogan, of Lodi; Mr. and Mrs. Pope, and many others are with us in the forward movement.

The meeting on Sunday night at the new Pioneer's Hall was the best of the campaign. Over five hundred were present. This is an elegant hall. The surroundings were brilliant. The audience was deeply attentiv. The subject, "Evolution and Creation." Miss Lottie Foreman added materially to the success with excellent music. Her father, D. E. Foreman, is a radical Spiritualist and of course Liberal. He has had some remarkable experiences. He is a broad, genial-minded man, and is not hedged in even by his own faith. So far as this world is concerned we are on the same platform. After the lecture Sunday evening the Liberal League met and considered business. It was decided to keep the old officers under marching orders and go ahead. I was invited to come back December 13th and accepted the invitation. The Stockton League has fine material when there is anything to bring it to action.

I shall be in San Diego November 8th, 15th, 22d, and 29th and at San Jacinto, Perris, San Pasquale, Santa Anna, Anaheim, Los Angeles, Monrovia, Handford, and La More during that month. I shall be at Oakdale December 6th and Stockton December 13th. I shall take a dash up north until about January 24th. The lecture field is promising. I hav all the work I can do, and hav no time to take off the harness. The platform is broadening every day in its influence.

I add R. M. Connely, Dr. Lilia Lomax, and George Hoerr to THE TRUTH SEEKER list. Others will follow.

Will Share His Light With a Brother.

CHICAGO, ILL., Oct. 10, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav no time or opportunity to get you new subscribers, but I am much interested in the cause; and as I see the names of unfortunate Freethinkers who are unable to pay for their paper but seem loath to giv it up, I will agree to pay for one of these each year as I renew, and leave you to judge whom to send it to. I inclose $5 for my renewal and the other subscriber as stated.

Very truly yours, JNO. L. JOHNSTONE.

Are Not Most Inventors Freethinkers?

BELLEVILLE, ONT., Oct. 15, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Mr. Littlehales, who is mentioned in the extract below, is a stanch Freethinker and has been a substantial help to the cause of Secularism in Canada. Is it not a fact that a large proportion of inventors are Freethinkers?

Yours, F. ASSELSTINE.

HAMILTON, Oct. 12.—Manager Littlehales of the Hamilton Gas Company works is said to hav succeeded in solving the problem of how to volatilize all the carbon in coal. By the present process hardly more than a sixth of the carbon can be volatilized or utilized for gas; but by the process which Mr. Littlehales has invented every pound of the eighteen hundred and thirty-six pounds of carbon in a ton of coal can be directly converted into gas, leaving nothing behind but useless slag.

Hard to Keep Parsons from Dead Freethinkers.

CARLISLE, IA., Oct. 19, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I write to let you know that one more of our old friend Liberals has passed to a peaceful rest. His name was Matt Farly. He was of our town. He died as he had lived, not recanting or favoring any so called Christian sect. He passed away very peacefully, without a struggle. But his mother was religiously inclined, so through her influence, as I understand, they had a United Brethren clergyman to put in his claim of Christ over the corpse, and when he had succeeded in making the family and friends feel as miserable as possible, he picked up his hat and left. Mr. Farly was, I think, forty-four years old and was an outspoken Liberal, and will be missed by the rest of us Liberals. M. GUISINGER.

GRANT'S PASS, ORE., Oct. 12, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: With feelings of pleasure and gratification I advise you of a visit from that worthy gentleman and able exponent of Freethought, Samuel P. Putnam, who addressed us October 7th and 8th. Indeed, we were pleased and enlightened, and in behalf of a number of Liberals say welcome, thrice welcome, here. For this is the kind of work which counts. It causes people to think for themselvs, thus insuring a victory for the right. I admire the cause of Universal Mental Liberty, and am glad I liv in such an advanced age of civilization, that permits us to tell and teach the truth without fear of thumbscrew, scalding vats, and funeral pyre.

Long liv the grand old TRUTH SEEKER and Watson Heston.

Yours for the truth, W. M. RICHARDS.

A Reformed Preacher.

NEW YORK, N. Y., Oct. 1, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am glad to find in this home of the oppressed men who are seeking for the truth. My experience is this: Your humble servant was born and principally raised in the South. I was educated for a physician, but, being endowed with an inquiring mind, I soon discovered that the profession was a humbug from a to z. My righteous indignation was aroused against such villainy, so I laid that aside and espoused Christianity as a minister of the gospel in the Missionary Baptist church. I began work fully believing that the call was from on high. At God's command "I studied to be a workman that need not be ashamed, rightly dividing the word of truth in due season to each one," etc. After a while I arrived upon a higher plane of Christianity than the brethren, so they began to cry "heretic." I then found that I was mistaken in the call; men had called me instead of God. I ceased to follow after the landmarks that had been set up by men who did not show by their acts that they were apostles, or practice what they preached. I took the Bible and gave them such a cleaning out that they gave up the job, as the people were on my side. When I had carried the point I offered to surrender the authority they had given me, but they would not take it. I burnt that little pen-scribbling on paper and quit trying to preach, as this part of the world had swallowed Jonah up. PREACHER.

Would Shoot and Stone a Freethought Lecturer.

ORILLIA, ONT., Oct. 7, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $7 for my own renewal and two new subscribers. We hav quite a number of Freethinkers in this place, but it takes some time to find them, as they as a rule keep quiet, as this is a priest-ridden town and you are spotted as soon as you say a word against the churches, but since Mr. Watts was here about a year ago there is a change, and they are beginning to talk.

We had Mr. Duval, of Hamilton, here last Saturday and Sunday. He spoke on the corner Saturday night and in the market square on Sunday at 3 o'clock and did not get through till about 6 in the evening. There was a large number to hear him, and a Mr. B. F. Kean made a reply, but got knocked out in the first round and did not stay to hear it done either. It has been the talk of the town since. Some say that he should hav been shot, stoned, run out of the country, etc., but they did not do anything except talk back a little on the start, and were promptly stopped.

My business takes me over a good deal of this north country and I find "good heads" in nearly every place I go, and I am of the opinion that if we could manage to hav a good lecturer come through once in a while we would hav a great many more converts. It is the young people we want to reach. Once let a bright young man understand that the Bible is not all true and the word of God, and, as a rule, he wants to know more, and it does not take long to get him out of the fog. J. W. BOYLE.

The Christian Has Only to Read—We Do the Rest.

ATLANTA, GA., Oct. 10, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav at last succeeded in obtaining a subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER. Inclosed you will find $3 and a slip containing the subscriber's address. It is a lady who a short time ago was an earnest worker for the church to which she belonged. She knew nothing of Liberal literature, but consented to read a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER—not to be convinced that the church was wrong, oh, no, but just to find out what I believed. You see the result. The church lost a victim, while Freethought has added to its ranks another lover of truth. I will send you an order for a couple of the Bible Picture Books in a few weeks. I had hoped to send several other subscriptions by this time, but this is a hard field to work, as the churches seem to run the town, even to abusing the mayor for allowing workmen to work on Sunday to clear up an impassable street in front of the fire-engin house, so that it might be possible to get the engins out if necessary. There is, however, a wave of liberty coming in this direction. It starts at Rome, Ga., where the good people of that place hav tired of being belittled by blackguards in the guise of ministers and hav demanded that the Sams, Jones and Small, appear before the grand jury and be made to prove, or rather to swallow, the libelous utterances made by them against the morals of the good people of that place.

I see by an article in THE TRUTH SEEKER that you wish to hav some printed matter distributed. I hav a little time I should be pleased to devote in that manner for you.

Respectfully, CHARLES E. MOORE.

A Boy of the Future.

HARRISON, TENN., Oct. 22, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: My dad takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. Dad's eyes are sore and ma has to read it to him and I listen to it. Sometimes I read in the children's department, but I do not like it very much. There is not enough science in it. I hav got an awful funny dad. I do not know what I would do if I had a dad like some boys. He teaches me just lots of funny things that other boys do not know. I can make a battery, and telegraph, and make pictures with a camera, and run a little steam-engin, and talk politics. I go to Sunday-school too. I do not go there to learn anything. I just go to see the girls. They say God wrote all the great big stories they tell me there. I wonder if God did not use to keep a grocery store and learn all those big stories there. I was down to the store the other night and a man told about a snake that jumped at one of his horses when he was going along the road. The snake missed his horse and hit his wagon tongue, and that there wagon tongue just swelled up as big as a saw-log in almost no time. The men all laughed and said it was the biggest lie they ever heard. I told them it was not half as big as one the Sunday-school teacher told us boys last Sunday about a man that had a cane that all of a sudden turned into a snake. I thought they would laugh, but they did not. They got mad and called me a little Infidel and said my dad ought to be hanged for bringing me up to say such things. One time last summer I put a frog down a boy's pants and it scared him half to death. I told dad about it and he laughed and said I had better go and try the same trick on another boy, so I did, and the boy just licked the stuffin' out of me. I went home crying and told dad and he just laughed and said he thought I would play that joke on the right boy some time. He says he likes to hav boys learn by experience, but I do not want any more such experience as that. I would rather dad would do that way than lick me for playing tricks himself.

I just wish you would put a little more science into the children's department. Dad says that if I would write some of the things about science he has told me maybe you would print it, but I will not, for this letter is too long now. Why do not some of the other boys write for THE TRUTH SEEKER?

Your thirteen-year-old friend, WILLIE GREEN.

Is Helping to Open Those Gates on Sunday.

FORT SCHUYLER, N. Y., Oct. 21, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: You will find inclosed the price of the "Life and Career of Charles Bradlaugh," which I should feel very much pleased to receive. I hav received all the other books and am well satisfied with them. I will not say that about your paper, because that goes without saying. I consider it superior to any paper I hav ever read, and it and the Boston Investigator are certainly the most welcome papers I receive. I believe it is getting better all the time. I am always glad to read the foreign Freethought news it contains.

I am doing all I can, by taking your advice, to keep the World's Fair open on Sunday. I am sending all articles in favor of the above to both Secretary Butterworth and the commissioners of this state, and if every Freethinker would do likewise we should probably be successful.

I noticed in your issue of the 17th instant a question asked by Mr. Rosenburg, if the word Jew indicates persons as believers in a certain religion or as a nation. Your answer was, "Both right." The former may be right, but I beg to differ with you as to the latter. To take the word Jew, meaning a descendant of the nation of Jews, independent of any religious belief, and apply it to a person just because he is a direct descendant of those people, I think would be preposterous. For instance, if your ancestors with the exception of your father were all Englishmen for a long distance back, could that justify you in saying that you are an Englishman when you and your father are born American? As to the religious side, I do not see how a man can be held to be a Jew after he severs all connections with his church, drops all the formalities of his sect, and becomes a total disbeliever in the fundamental doctrins of the Mosaic law, any more than Hugh O. Pentecost can be a Christian after becoming a disbeliever in the fundamental Christian doctrins or a man can be a Catholic after denouncing his church and becoming a Protestant. The fact alone of his becoming a Protestant excludes him from being a Catholic. The same with a Jew who becomes a Freethinker. It can not be a matter of distant nationality that makes a person a Jew, because I was reading only a short time ago of a lady who was going to become a Jewess. So I cannot see how a man can be a Jew after he comes to disbelieve in all their doctrins, any more than this lady can be a Jewess after she becomes a member of that church and then some time afterward disbelieves in their doctrins and severs her connection with that church.

Yours for more Freethinkers with the courage of their convictions, R. H. ROSENTHAL.

Lincoln Not a Spiritualist.

MARENGO, ILL., Oct. 22, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: When that prince of Spiritualistic humbugs, "Colonel" Bundy, of the Religio Philosophical Journal, concocted the latest scheme with the notorious Miss Colburn Maynard to draw the easily gulled into the Spiritualistic fold, said scheme being embodied in a book recently published by them relating how Lincoln became converted to their doctrin, they probably felt safe in so doing under the impression that "dead men tell no tales," but when a living one appeared in the person of Lincoln's private secretary, Nicolay, they must hav felt as though they had reckoned without their host after all. I inclose an extract from the Chicago News showing how their "little game" was spoiled, which will probably be read with great interest by your readers, as this latest invention has been published in numerous public journals, especially Eastern ones. The fraud, however, would hav been apparent even if Nicolay had not exposed it, for it is not at all likely that a quarter of a century would hav passed before Spiritualists had utilized the report that Lincoln attended séances if there was any truth in it. And yet this Bundy has the monumental cheek to introduce a law to put a stop to fraudulent mediumistic practices. It would be a pity if he were not caught in his own trap. If all bogus mediums and Spiritualistic quacks were expelled from their ranks, methinks there would be few, if any, left to bury the carcass of this greatest of all modern delusions, and if they were marked out according to their deserts, Bundy would lead the van.

H. WETTSTEIN.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Oct. 20, 1891.—John G. Nicolay, the private secretary and intimate associate of Lincoln and the distinguished historian of the martyred president, was called upon by the Daily News correspondent to-day with a view to ascertaining what truth there was in the sensational story that Lincoln was a Spiritualist, and was in the habit of holding séances at the White House. Mrs. Colburn Maynard, a medium, started the story, and Colonel Bundy, of Chicago, editor of a religio-philosophical journal, adds corroborativ testimony, which was telegraphed to many of the Eastern newspapers to-day.

Historian Nicolay was in his library, surrounded by his books and busy with some old Lincoln manuscripts. He is about sixty years of age, with meager frame, intellectual face, and tawny-gray, full beard. He had seen the statement of the medium and the corroboration of Colonel Bundy, and had dismissed both as idle stories having no foundation in fact.

Mr. Nicolay talked freely and said that he could declare without qualification that President Lincoln was not a Spiritualist and had no inclination in that direction. He had been the president's private secretary throughout the war, was with him almost night and day under the same roof at the White House, and he would undoubtedly hav known if anything so unusual as Spiritualistic séances were going on at the executiv mansion. He never heard of anything of the kind, and he is absolutely positiv that nothing of the kind occurred.

"Of course," added Mr. Nicolay, "I hav no doubt that Mr. Lincoln, like a great many other men, might hav had some curiosity as to Spiritualism, and that he might hav attended some of these séances solely out of curiosity. But he was the last man in the world to yield to any other judgment than that arrived at by his own mature deliberation. He was not superstitious, nor did he hav any Spiritualistic tendencies. I hav attended Spiritualistic séances, not because I believed in them, but because I was curious to see the proceedings. They were such manifest humbugs that I usually came away disgusted. If President Lincoln ever attended séances, as alleged, it was with this same feeling of curiosity. But I do not remember that even curiosity ever impelled him to attend a séance. He had more important business on hand during those days. In any event, I can say, without the slightest qualification, that a séance never occurred at the White House."

Mr. Nicolay treats as ridiculous the story that the proclamation of emancipation was hastened by advices from the spirit-land, and also that Lincoln went to the front to learn the conditions prevailing among the soldiers after being advised by the medium to take this course. To show the absurdity of the statement Mr. Nicolay pointed to that portion of Colonel Bundy's interview which says that while Lincoln received advice from the spirit-world, he never followed it blindly unless it conformed to his own better judgment. Mr. Nicolay says that it was this judgment in all cases which directed affairs and not any claptrap of mediums. As to the statements that Mrs. Lincoln had afterward become an ardent Spiritualist at St. Charles, Ill., Mr. Nicolay declared that this had no bearing upon President Lincoln's life at the White House, for it was well known that Mrs. Lincoln became unfortunately eccentric after the assassination of her husband, and particularly during the latter days of her life.

Aurora Christians Would Assassinate a Freethought Lecturer.

TOPEKA, KAN., Oct. 24, 116.

MR. EDITOR: I write to tell your readers of my experience in Aurora, Neb., last September. After a correspondence with Col. Delavan Bates, of Aurora, who is an alleged Liberal, I was induced to go to Aurora and giv a course of lectures on phrenology, etc. I rented Colonel Bates's hall for five nights, agreeing to pay him $25 for use of his hall. I was to giv all the lectures free but one, and that one was to be given at a small admission. Colonel Bates represented to me that the town was a good place for anything like that; so I went to Aurora and remained a week before the time for the lectures so as to hav them thoroughly advertised. I put up at the best hotel in town, paid my own bills, announced the lectures by large lithographs, small circulars, announced them in all three of the papers in town and paid the cash in advance for it. I had $4,000 worth of scenery, forty-five skulls, numerous manikins, busts, etc., and put all of them on exhibition in the hall that the hall would hold. I gave three of the lectures to small houses, but they were well received. These three I gave free for both sexes. The next night I was to giv my fourth lecture on "Matrimony and Beauty," for both sexes, and at ten cents admission, but was prevented from doing so by being arrested for not taking out a license of $5 a day for offering to cure chronic diseases by telling the patients what kind of food to eat and how it should be cooked. The above hygienic recommendations are all I use for the treatment of diseases. I was taken before a lean, low-browed brigand that calls himself by the ominous title of "police judge," who tried to blackmail me out of $60 in the form of "fine and costs." The principal persecutor in the scheme was the mayor, a lumpy-browed, flat-headed, dissipated villain who took a disliking to me because I told my audience how to tell whether persons are honest by their heads, and as this good Christian's head would not stand any test for honesty or morality, he was greatly alarmed, as he feared his customers would cease dealing with him when they discovered what a villain he is. There are a gang of these villains here who attempt to cinch and blackmail every stranger who happens to come to Aurora. They call themselvs the "city council" and their methods of blackmailing they call "city ordinances." Mayor Shean is the chief of these brigands and outlaws, and the fat, beefy, carnivorous editor of the Aurora Sun is their mouthpiece and defender. The Sun is a dirty, scurrilous, blackmailing sheet and violently pious and Democratic. Most of the lawyers of Aurora belong to this gang, as I discovered after my arrest by their refusal to take hold of my case, as I wished to take an appeal to the district court. Not one of them would take my case, but all of them advised me to pay the fine. Colonel Bates, the alleged Freethinker, belongs to this gang, and is a member of the city council and helped to enact such an outrageous ordinance. The villains ought to hav been glad to get such a course of lectures free, and could well hav afforded to pay me $500 for such services as I gave them, let alone jumping on me after I had given all the free lectures and had paid all my own expenses, amounting to at least $75, and trying to blackmail me out of $60. I hav been in the lecture field thirteen years and never received such infamous treatment in all my life. I can furnish a hundred people who would testify that the above is a correct statement of facts, as well as twenty others who hav been treated similarly by this gang. Everyone should giv Aurora, Hamilton county, Neb., a wide berth. There are many other towns in the state that are nearly as bad as Aurora, and the whole state is trying to rival Russia in the tyranny and injustice of its infamous alleged laws and the bigots and tyrants at the back of them. The other two papers in Aurora do not belong to the gang and they declined to publish my arrest and disgraceful treatment in Aurora. I inclose you this lecture program that I used in Aurora to giv you an idea of my lecture course. I do not like to make public anything of this kind, but feel that it is my duty, as it may save some other poor devil from falling into their clutches. If a man should undertake to lecture in Aurora on Freethought the fanatic Christians would assassinate him.

Yours for justice, DR. C. W. MCCORMICK.

Spirit-Searchers Impugned.

WILKESBARRE, PA., Oct. 20, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: E. D. Slenker gets an occasional desire to investigate Spiritualism. Whenever that feeling possesses her she at once makes an announcement of the fact through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Spiritual papers, so as to giv warning to the spirits and Spiritualists that Elmina is on the warpath in the search of a spirit. I hav noticed these periodical efforts for years, and also the published results, and while she has been able to witness much that is unaccountable, owing no doubt to the favorable opportunities presented for her special benefit by the Spiritualists, she is never disposed to giv the public any very exact account of just what did happen, so as to let it judge, but covers the whole performance under those oily and evasiv words, which she so well knows how to use, "I got nothing that hit nearer than a fortune-teller might hit," etc. "Friends told me marvels and showed me autographs and portraits innumerable said to hav been produced under absolute test conditions. I think probably the phenomena are much of them real. But what produces it, I know not. I do not think the dead hav anything to do with it, but that it is some not understood power or faculty in the living," etc. Now, when a person of intelligence is so credulous in unbelief as she, I am inclined to call it the credulity of unbelief. That is, simply that such a person so constituted is ready to believe any unreasonable theory in preference to the plain, simple, and reasonable truth, and of course that such person is utterly unfit to decide the momentous facts and phenomena of Spiritualism. When a person sees an intelligent communication, purporting to come from the spirit, which givs incidents, dates, locations, pictures of friends, and the various circumstances all precluding fraud or the conscious contact of mortals, and tamely, after looking at all the facts, can say "it must be some faculty in the living" which produces them, I am simply disgusted with such driveling incapacity to weigh facts, and any such investigator might go on from July to eternity and remain just the same doubting one to the end. The idea that a picture could produce itself upon a cardboard in broad daylight, and be the exact likeness of my friend, wife, brother, or sister in spirit life, coming in the presence of myself, and another person (the medium) who never touched the slate or card—then the idea that in some way I or that medium must hav done it, a thing of which we are both incapable and unconscious, is the quintessence of unreasoning credulity. For whatever it is, it is an intelligence which does such things, and it must be akin to human thought and life. It can be no lower power or intelligence than the human. It is simply impossible that anything other than intelligence can produce these phenomena, and as we who are witnesses in the flesh do not produce them, it is but reasonable to conclude that it must be what it invariably claims to be, spirits. Why deny the work of the spirits when you hav no evidence that it can be anything else? I refer now to such phenomena as preclude the possibility of fraud. For instance—Mrs. Perry and myself visited Onset last August, called upon a Mrs. Gillett for a slate-writing, and made an appointment for a time subsequent, giving no names. We had never seen Mrs. Gillett, nor had she ever seen either of us. As I had often witnessed slate-writing, I proposed that the spirits should devote their messages and attention to my wife, and said, "Let her sit to the table and see what they can do for her." She was requested to wash her slates, by the medium, and place her hands upon them, the medium sitting about a foot or two away from the table and not touching it or the slates at all. She remained there rocking herself on a chair and talking pleasantly about the trip to Onset, the weather, etc., while my wife held her hands upon her slates upon the table. There was no slate-pencil put upon those slates, and they were fastened by strong rubbers both ways to hold them solid. In a few minutes the medium said, "I think you hav got something; open the slates and see." She did so and there was a communication covering the whole of one slate, purporting to come from her father, names, etc. In this way, after handing the slates to me to read, she got writing on twelve or fourteen slates, giving facts, dates, names, places, and evidences of the fact that many of our friends were there and interested in telling us of their love and pleasure at this unexpected meeting. Finally upon one of the slates was written, "I want you to take this which I will make to my family; it will be a great test to them," signed Richard. Two slates were then cleaned off and placed upon the table as before, wife holding her hands upon them, no pencil or other thing to mark with being placed between them, and in about one minute the medium said, "It is finished, so you can look." The slate contained four fairly distinct faces, and a number of faces interwoven and shadowy, and parts of faces as if a group had stood together and their images had been thrown upon the slate. The writing on the side of the pictures and below them was this: "Johnnie, your boy, is here," on the side. And lengthwise of the slate below was written crosswise: "Dear Martha, I am here and I love you and Nellie still. I want to help you both. I want to come to Scranton, nearer home. Yours ever, Richard." This was a production for the family of my brother Richard, who liv in Scranton, Pa. You will observe the pertinent facts in connection are: First, "Johnnie, your boy, is here." Now, neither my wife nor myself knew that they had lost a Johnnie. Secondly, the name of his wife Martha, also Nellie, Scranton, and Richard. And thirdly, the connected letter and the fact of connecting his daughter Nellie with the mother, who was his favorit child, and lastly, the recognition by the mother of the picture of Johnnie, who died when about six years old. Mrs. Gillett was as unconscious of the remarkable tests we had received as a school-girl; was not conscious of a single fact in the beautiful chain of evidence she had been the unconscious medium of getting for us, nor did I realize its value so fully until some weeks thereafter when I presented the slates to my brother's family in Scranton, Pa., as requested by him. These facts are stubborn things and cannot be set aside by such doubtful allusions of Elmina and other hard-headed and unreasonable doubters who are always "in search of a spirit" but never finding one. The truth is, they are not in search of spirits; they are only intent on finding trickery. They carry an egotistic trick-bag on their shoulders and are apt to get what they are in search of, and I do not blame the spirits if they do dupe such ones just to punish their unreasoning unbelief; for the reason, too, that no matter how self-evident or convincing a test might be, to such, it would be ascribed to the arts and tricks of mediums or the wonderful faculty some hav of guessing. Anything under heaven, no matter how absurd or implausible, will do, only not a spirit, for such. Such unfortunate minds are not susceptible of conviction. They are natural doubters, and do not pretend to be able to decide between trickery and the truth, and this is not for want of general intelligence, but simply from their credulity of unbelief.

It occurs to me to mention one more case. While in Philadelphia a year ago, through Mrs. Beste, my daughter Mary came fully materialized, apparently from another room, the cabinet having been a curtain placed across the corner. I recognized her voice and understood her message to mother and the family but could not distinguish her features. I requested her to come again under a strong light. She said she would try. In fifteen minutes she came again, but I said, "Mary, I recognize your voice but I cannot get your features yet." So she came again the third time, under a stronger light, when I fully recognized her features, and said, "Now I am satisfied." She smiled and sank down out of sight while I held her hand. The following week I had another sitting with a business medium whom I had not seen or consulted since 1876. After a time this medium said, "There is a short, thick-set spirit behind your chair who says he is your brother." As I had but one brother in spirit, I said, "Yes, I lost a brother." She said, "He calls himself Uncle Dick." I said, "Yes, his name was Richard." "Yes, but he says he went by the name of Uncle Dick," which was a fact. After some other interchange of conversation the medium said, "Your daughter Mary is here, and she feels so happy to know that you recognized her the other night when she materialized." These are the little facts which convey the stupendous truths of the after life and make Spiritualists.

The Story Getting Smaller.

SUSPENSION BRIDGE, N. Y., Oct. 13, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: In regard to the clipping from the Chicago Herald of September 31 and printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 3d concerning the suicide mania in Bradford, Pa., I wrote a friend residing in Bradford, requesting him to giv me all the facts in the case known to him. I inclose his letter, together with the newspaper clippings he sent. If they are of any use to you, you are at liberty to use them.

H. HOWLAND.

BRADFORD, PA., Oct. 10, 1891.

N. HOWLAND, Susp. Bridge, Dear Friend: Your letter received. I will inclose newspaper items about the death of Dr. Stuart and Elias Heasley, which explain the cases more fully than anything I hav been able to learn from individuals who were quite intimate with the doctor. Mr. Heasley was from Limestone, N. Y. I find no one who was acquainted with him. I find no one who knows anything about the doctor's belonging to any society who held principles as stated in the Chicago paper. The doctor was considered a smart and well-read man, and the manner he ended his life was a surprise to all. Yours truly,

F. L. BLASDELL.

AN ECCENTRIC MAN.

To those unacquainted with Dr. Stuart the announcement of his suicide last evening caused considerable consternation, but those who were intimate with the suicide in life were not as much surprised, because he often said that he would end his worldly career in just such a way.

Dr. Stuart was seventy-six years of age and had resided in Bradford for the past twelve years. He was well known throughout this part of Pennsylvania, and although an eccentric man was well liked by many people. He was a graduate of the Berkshire Medical College in 1844, and was a successful practitioner. Of late years he had not followed the calling of his profession on account of ill health and old age. In former years he resided at Erie, Pa., and during the oil excitement on Oil Creek he resided at Petroleum Center, where he carried on a profitable practice. The revolver with which he ended his life yesterday was one he obtained while residing at Petroleum Center. It was given to him by a man who accidentally shot himself and decided he would never carry another weapon of that description.

The deceased has been a sufferer from disease for many years and several months ago his life was nearly despaired of by reason of a tumor at the base of the brain. It was this agony that caused him to say often that some day he would take his own life. Through some domestic trouble he had not resided with his wife for many years. Mrs. Stuart lives at Erie, Pa., with her two sons. Besides acquiring a first-class medical education the suicide was a studious reader and was naturally endowed with the faculty of painting. This was an amusement for him, and he spent many pleasant hours with his brush, palet, and canvas. As a result the walls of his office are hung with a number of pleasing pictures. Some time ago he commenced the painting of a picture which he intended to present to the Bradford Hospital, but it was never finished. He was ingenious, as the arrangements of his office indicated.

Dr. Stuart always advocated and believed that life terminated in its entirety when the spirit left its home of clay on this earth. So strong was his belief in that direction that he had been writing a book on that subject and requested that it be put in print after his demise.

Even in his hours of misery he was nearly always in a cheerful mood, when engaged in conversation with anyone, and delighted in telling a story or perpetrating a joke. He took delight in exhibiting to visitors at his office a skeleton head in oil which he executed himself and said was his likeness after he had passed away. A closer scrutiny of the subject disclosed the fact that there was more truth than fancy in the whim.

He made all preparations for his death and for the final disposition of his remains. The doctor was attired in a neat suit of black, clean linen, was shaved, and everything about his person was tidy.

About two years ago he composed a funeral march, which he wanted a band to play at his burial. He also directed that no funeral services should be held over his remains. The body was placed in charge of Undertaker C. J. Lane.

ANOTHER SUICIDE.

Elias Heasley, aged sixty-six years, a resident of State Line, committed suicide yesterday afternoon at Limestone by taking a dose of "Rough on Rats." He died at 6 o'clock in great agony. The suicide sat around the hotel all afternoon talking with acquaintances and apparently was in cheerful spirits. No cause can be assigned for the rash deed. The remains were taken to the late home of the deceased at State Line. His struggles attracted the attention of the people about the house, and when several of them repaired to his room he was conscious enough to tell them not to send for a doctor. However, two physicians were summoned, but he was beyond their aid.

all our own, however small; and as the society grows (as we trust it will) the paper can keep pace with us. A small four-page sheet, 11x14 inches, published monthly, or even quarterly, would be all sufficient for our present needs. This little sheet would be quite large enough to contain our acknowledgments of contributions and any necessary bulletins about the American Secular Union, and leave us a good deal of room besides. In that extra room we could hav, besides appeals for state Secularization, articles for young people that would make this little sheet a most welcome visitor in the home of every true Liberal, while the chances for missionary work among the young with this modest little journal would be self-evident. No one religious creed should be exalted above another in its columns; the reader should be led to respect alike the doctrins of Theist and Atheist, Materialist, Spiritualist, and Theosophist, while holding fast through all to the fundamental right of Free-thought.

As for the cost of such a journal, if it were desired to giv it away, $300 a year would more than enable us to publish quarterly and mail a thousand copies, or four thousand in all during the year; and, with close reckoning, it is likely the expense could be reduced to very nearly $200. If, as seems wiser, a subscription were charged, for the benefit of the American Secular Union, it seems as though even a moderate estimate would make this journal very nearly self-supporting. Here is a chance for our wealthy Liberals to step forward and help along an important missionary work among the young, as well as among outsiders whom we wish to interest in the separation of state and church.

The American Secular Union has now reached a point in its history when it must either largely increase its sphere of work or sink out of public sight altogether. For fifteen years its course has been that of a brook, now foaming madly down the mountain-side, tearing away the rocks and trees that happen to lie across its path; and again creeping sulkily along in its channel, choked by the débris which its own mad rush has precipitated upon itself. To-day it has reached a watershed, so to speak, where its destiny trembles in the balance between two futures. On the one side are smiling fields and fruitful valleys, ready to be rendered still more glad by this stream; a hundred tiny rills, ready to be caught up into its vigorous current, and swept on and on in a veritable river of blessing, far away beyond the horizon of the coming years; hamlets which need this stream if they are to grow into cities; cities which need the blessing of religious freedom which this stream, and only this stream, of all the rivers that flow, can bring them, if they are to escape the fate of other communities of the past which hav one and all crumbled before the blasting tyranny of a united church and state. On the other side of the watershed we see—what? A desert of shifting sand, in which even a fuller current than ours can only sink down, down out of sight forever, useless and forgotten; a desert of whirlwinds that blow everywhere and nowhere; a desert which can only be reclaimed, not by the sacrifice of a stream's life, but by the gradual encroachment upon its borders of the woodland and farm, from the other side of the mountain, which this stream of ours shall hav first enriched and developed.

The time is brief in which our stream is likely to pause upon this watershed of choice between these two futures. A day, a week, a month may fix its future course unalterably. Shall that course be one of blessing or of disaster to the hopes of Liberalism?

Let the Liberals of the country reply.

IDA C. CRADDOCK, Corr. Secy. A. S. U.

Philadelphia, Pa., Oct. 31, 1891.

Miss Craddock was followed by F. C. Mende, the Treasurer, who reported that some twenty-one hundred dollars had been raised during the past year and all expended but $67 80. Of this he had $19 30 on hand and $48 50 was in the hands of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Mr. Mende said that when he was first elected Treasurer he had purchased a safe, but found he had no use for it. The Board of Directors, he said, had spent hours consulting how to raise funds, but gave it up as too hard work. His report was referred to Doctor Kay and Mr. Geiger, as auditors, who looked at it and reported it correct, which it undoubtedly is.

Mr. Wakeman moved that the reports be received and laid over to be discussed in the afternoon. He would also like to know the names of the Chicago people who were to be honored with the present of the Union. He wanted to know if anybody knew them. There were, too, reflections in the President's and Secretary's reports upon two members of the Board of Directors. The differences in the Board the past year had been, he thought, of a latent character, arising from honest differences as to the proper course and policy for the Union to pursue. The majority of the Board lived in Philadelphia, and seemed to consider themselvs as all sufficient. They did not ask him to consult with them, and he had never had any opportunity to pass upon the Prize Manual. As to the charge that he had neglected to prepare a memorial regarding Sunday opening of the World's Fair his conscience was clear. The Board had adopted a petition found in a paper, and he and Doctor Foote had always been ready to add sugges tions, but the Union was in the hands of the President and Secretary, who assumed the attitude and seemed to say that they had better be left alone.

Mr. Chamberlain seconded Mr. Wakeman's motion and added that he would like to know, as to Girard College, who the "experienced and wise counsel," to quote the President's description, were. He wanted to know what had been done, what it was proposed to do, and how far the Union had been committed in the matter. With Mr. Chamberlain's amendment the motion was carried.

Mr. Westbrook, D.D., was asked to name the men and women of Chicago whom he had slated as the officers' successors. In response he said that he had long been in favor of removing the Union headquarters to Chicago, and had had a long correspondence—some hundred letters—on the subject. He would name Judge C. B. Waite for President, Mrs. M. A. Freeman for Secretary, M. Reiman for Treasurer, and J. F. Geeting, Doctor Greer, W. S. Andres, and E. M. Geer, as Vice-Presidents, who with the President, Secretary, and Treasurer, compose the Board of Directors. It was, Mr. Westbrook, D.D., said, simply impossible for the old officers to serve again.

It was then moved to adjourn to meet again at 2:30 to discuss the reports. The President answered back that he had only engaged the hall for one session, for which five dollars had been paid, but presumed it could be had for another session for another five dollars, if anybody would pay it. The Congress determined to hav it, and adjourned.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

At 2:30 the President lifted the gavel and called the Congress to order. He had, he said, no desire to precipitate any discussion on the report. He didn't care at all what the Congress did with the reports. It could accept them, reject them, or do anything else it pleased with them. But he had committed to writing his answer to Messrs. Wakeman and Chamberlain. In answer to the former, he said, No Board meeting was held without notifying Mr. Wakeman and Dr. Foote. Sometimes meetings had been omitted because they could not attend; and they had been present at two meetings only. They were appointed to attend to drafting a memorial to the World's Fair authorities on Sunday opening of that show, and this he was prepared to prove by documentary evidence. [Dr. Foote interrupted, and admitted this.] On the only question on which the Board was divided [as to appointing Mr. Watts field secretary at a salary of $2 000] they stood five to two, and the five gave in to the two. Everything that had been done in regard to the Prize Manual had been approved by the Board, and especially by Mr. Wakeman.

In answer to Mr. Chamberlain's inquiries about Girard College, he would say that the American Secular Union had taken no action until he had published his book on the subject, which had cost him about six hundred dollars. In the matter of the College he had neither asked nor received advice or money from the Union, and he declined to communicate anything about it to anybody. It was his own business, and no one's else. He did not explain, however, why it was that if it is no business of the Union's he mentioned it in his report.

Dr. Foote then offered a resolution to the effect that the Congress would receive the President's and Secretary's reports, but without indorsing the attacks upon the Liberal lecturers, the Liberal press, and the Liberal public.

Mr. Wakeman spoke to this resolution, saying that without question the majority of the Board were honest in their determination to follow their own policy, but they had made a great mistake. They had refused to follow the directions of the Congress, and instead had spent most of their time trying to placate their enemies by sacrificing their friends. They had sacrificed the Liberals to the Unitarians and other mongrel sects. The Liberals had been practically turned down.

In regard to the Manual, Mr. Wakeman said that no copy had been sent to a Liberal until the book had been out for months. [Interruption by the President, denying this. Mr. Wakeman took back months, but stuck to a month, and added that he understood the book had been sent around for review in September.] The book, continued the speaker, is an attempt to sustain Christian morality without the Christian basis, which is like trying to grow a tree without any roots. We want a Secular morality based on Secular philosophy, not a Christian morality based on Christian authority with the Christianity left out. In order to make a success of the American Secular Union an amendment to its constitution should be made. The elements within it could never agree. It should be run on the new faith. The officers had done the best they knew by sacrificing their friends mercilessly. We should learn from the English and Canadian Secularists, and make the Union a truly Secular organization.

Miss Craddock, with a disregard of parliamentary usage easily forgiven in that charming lady, interrupted, as she explained it, by rising "to a question of fact." It was all about the memorial to the Chicago World's Fair authorities. Mr. Wakeman had been asked to attend to it. Then she rebuked him severely for not attending the meetings of the Board. Mr. Wakeman assured the lady and the Congress that Chicago would be attended to in due time.

Dr. Foote read his resolution again [the President interrupting him to say he would vote for it], and added that the Memorial to Chicago World's Fair authorities was not timely. Such a document should go to Chicago with the petitions, with some one to present them. The petitions had been wisely held back till the opportune moment.

Dr. Foote said that he could indorse the officers more than did Mr. Wakeman. The President was right about the conditions of his acceptance of the office. But he, the speaker, thought it to be a fact that it is not possible to run the Union on the basis of Liberal Christianity. Dr. McGlynn and the Rev. Mr. Savage had come down to Philadelphia, spoken for the Union, and been paid for it; but had either ever formed an auxiliary Union or influenced a cent into the Union's treasury? In England and Canada they had Unions based on something besides——

[Interruptions by the President and Secretary. When they had quieted down Dr. Foote resumed.]

The English and Canadian Unions were not founded on political action alone. They were Secularists and worked on that line, and he believed that their policy was the best. As for the Spiritualists, of whom the officers had said so much, claiming that they had during the summer contributed more to the Union than the Liberals, he did not believe that the Spiritualists as a body took any interest in the movement, nor had they paid much into the Union's treasury.

[Interruption by Mr. Westbrook: "The New Yorkers hav not paid anything."]

DR. FOOTE: Has the President of the Union paid anything? I hav put up more money than ever Mr. Westbrook did.

Resuming his speech, Dr. Foote said that it was of no use to try to get the different religious elements to support the Union. Neither the Protestants nor the Liberal Christians will help financially The Secretary, said the gallant doctor, was good. He liked the way she worked, but her efforts did not seem to accomplish much. The work of all the secretaries did not seem to do much practically. The trouble was probably that as they had to work all the time to get money to pay their salaries, and as they only got about enough to pay that, they had not ing left with which to work for the objects of the Union. Such being the case, their efforts were largely wasted.

[Interruption by Miss Craddock to say that she raised more money than E. A. Stevens did when he was Secretary.]

The President said he did not want to stay there all day, and he wanted the discussion closed.

Mr. Wakeman then offered a proposed amendment to the constitution of the Union, the purport of which is to make the Union a Secular body, in line with Canada and England. To this he attached a resolution directing the officers to be elected to carry it out in their policy of work for next year.

Miss Craddock interrupted to ask whether the policy of the Union should be Liberal Christian or Infidel.

Mr. Wakeman assured her that if she had patience she would know when another resolution which he had to offer was read. He then read the resolution, which was to the effect that the motivs of the Liberal press should be the motivs of the Union. That, he said, made everything plain. The proper foundation for a secular state is a Secular philosophy, and until we hav that the secular state is not safe. When the Union adopted that policy, he said, Liberal people could work for it, the Liberal press could support it, the Liberal lecturers could sustain it, and money could be obtained for it. Therefore he wanted the Congress to "respectfully request" the officers to pursue that policy. He would ask that the officers be directed to pursue this policy, only he had learned at the Portsmouth Congress that the officers were not bound by a vote of the Congress, but would do as they pleased anyway. So he put it that the Congress "respectfully request" it. He thought the Chicago folks slated to succeed the present Board would agree to it, but if they did not then they should be put out, for it was time to change the policy of the Union. We must stand on our own bottom and not on "liberal Christianity."

Mr. Westbrook said that it was the ruling of the Chair that Mr. Wakeman's resolution was out of order and could not be entertained by the Congress.

Mr. Wakeman appealed from the decision of the Chair. The Congress could request the high and mighty officers who were to succeed the high and mighty powers now in. Even the czar of Russia could be petitioned, and a cat might look at a king, though it might do little good. The ruling of the Chair was the thing that was out of order.

Mr. Westbrook put the appeal from the Chair to the Congress, but before the Congress could get hold of it a Philadelphia gentleman made a speech which evoked applause from the fair Philadelphia contingent. Those who supported the Chair were then asked to rise. The Secretary said there were twelve. Mrs. Westbrook said she saw thirteen. They stood up again. The Secretary saw fourteen or fifteen, she was not sure which. On the third count the number was called fourteen. Against the Chair eleven, with no subsequent counts.

Leonard Geiger moved to elect officers. The President was asked to read his slate. He nominated C. B. Waite. Mr. Wakeman was nominated. He declined, as did Dr. Foote and E. M. Macdonald when their names were put up. Mr. Waite was elected by a vote of nineteen to one. The next name on the slate was Mrs. M. A. Freeman, who received seventeen votes. M. Reiman was third on the slate, and was elected Treasurer. [Interruption here by a lady who wanted Mr. Mende to send his safe to Mr.

Reiman. When the joke had been explained to the President by Mrs. Westbrook and the Secretary, and he had laughed, the election went on.] John F. Gosting, Dr. Greer, W. S. Andres, and E. M. Greer completed the slate.

Mr. Burnier submitted an amendment changing one of the articles of the constitution, and he was promptly sat upon. Then the President graciously reconsidered his ruling and let him in. The change is to take away voting powers from annual members.

Mr. Westbrook said he was happy to be released from an onerous burden. He had served three years, and in all his duties he had done the best he knew how. The labor of getting out the Prize Manual had been immense. He had himself written two or three thousand letters about it. Eleven hundred dollars had been subscribed. One thousand dollars had been paid to the authors, and the odd hundred, together with another hundred at least from his own pocket, had been used in the necessary business connected therewith. The trusteeship of the fund came not from the Union but from the subscribers. Any reflection that he had not paid anything to the Union was a vile slander. He then begged pardon for all he had said against the members of the Board and Congress.

Miss Craddock desired to hav a collection taken up to pay for the use of the hall that afternoon. Dr. Foote suggested that the rent be charged to the Union. Mr. Westbrook said that if THE TRUTH SEEKER would turn over the money belonging to the Union that might be done. The business manager of THE TRUTH SEEKER said that the money was ready for the Union, and would hav been paid had not Mr. Westbrook written him a very insulting letter. Under the circumstances it would be paid to the new officers. The business manager also suggested that if the officers had used less cash for railroad fares across the continent and to watering-places the Union would be better off. Miss Craddock then rose up in wrath. The hundred dollars for her railroad fare across the continent had been voted by the Congress. As to fare to watering-places, Westbrook was stopping at Asbury Park and she had to go and see him. That was all, and when she was at Asbury Park she worked like a Trojan.

Mr. J. F. Foster of the Boston Ingersoll Secular Society then obtained the floor. He had, he said, been sent as a delegate from that society to see what was going on in the American Secular Union. The National Liberal League was a disgrace to Liberalism, and the American Secular Union was just like it. It was a wrong step taken when the Ingersoll Secular Society joined it. The logrolling of this Congress had undoubtedly killed the Union. The Ingersoll Secular Society had done more real work than the whole Union. It had obtained twenty thousand names to a petition repealing the law exempting church property from taxation and had got a bill in the legislature to that effect and expected to pass it.

[Interruption by Miss Craddock, who said Mr. Foster had told her that the Massachusetts Liberals were so successful because they had the clergy with them. Miss Craddock thought that indicated that the Christians were, after all, the folks to tie to.]

Mr. Foster resuming, said they had compelled some of the Protestant clergy to advocate this measure just as the Abolitionists had forced the preachers to support their doctrins.

Miss Craddock still thought the Unitarians were about the best friends of state secularization on top of the ground. The Liberals, she said, denounced other people's beliefs. [Interruption by Dr. Foote, who suggested that though she might hav faith in them she would not get a dollar from them to help along the movement.] Miss Craddock then apologized for all of her offensiv remarks.

Mr. Wakeman moved to adjourn, but recalled the motion, for the Congress to receive from Captain Robert C. Adams the fraternal greeting of the Canadian Secular Union and the Montreal Pioneer Freethought Society, of both which organizations he is president. Mr. Adams was invited to the platform, from which vantage-point he tendered his greeting to the Congress "assembled in the City of Brotherly Love." [Smiles from the audience.] The Canadians, he said, carried on their propaganda from an antitheological standpoint, and he believed that to be the only true policy. Free and independent men usually spoke their minds, but he was glad to see that the members of this Congress had heeded the advice given by an old preacher to the couples he joined in matrimony, to wit: Never both get angry at the same time. He counseled those who did not believe in the policy adopted by the officers of the Union to retire and form another Union. That would be a generous rivalry. He would be glad to lay down his presidency when the American and Canadian Freethinkers could join in one organization, and perhaps such a union could be made the forerunner of that mighty political union of the countries which was surely coming and which he hoped to see.

Mr. Westbrook said the American Secular Union was exceedingly glad to greet Captain Adams, whose father was the most orthodox man in Boston, though Captain Adams was the most radical man alive except himself. Mr. Westbrook claimed to be something like the man at the county fair whose asseveration of the truth of an occurrence was that "it is as true as that I hav got a wagon-load of melons outside the gate which I want to sell for fifteen cents apiece." The speaker said that he had recently written a book, the last chapter of which was stereotyped, which was the most radical book in the world, and its author was more radical than Colonel Ingersoll or Thaddeus B. Wakeman.

Mr. Wakeman arose to refer to Captain Adams's suggestion that those who did not like the policy of the Union should withdraw and form another Union. Such a course, he said, would not do. The folks who object will be on hand next year, and for several years thereafter. They are the founders of the Union. The Ingersoll Secular Society must not withdraw. Bolting has been the death of all reforms. As for the differences between the officers, they amount to nothing.

Miss Craddock congratulated Mr. Wakeman upon his determination to work for the cause of state Secularization, for, in all the time that she had known him, she said, he had done nothing.

Mr. Foster said that the Ingersoll Secular Society is bigger than the American Secular Union. It has a library of fifteen thousand volumes [willed to it by Photius Fiske] locked up because of a petty legal squabble, and a two hundred and eighty thousand dollar building, which it can use free. The American Secular Union ought to reform, he thought, and aim at what it intends to hit.

Miss Craddock said the American Secular Union had a thousand members—at least five hundred. When she took possession of the society it had no books or anything else. There was nothing on hand.

With these friendly speeches, and several asides still more cordial, the fifteenth annual congress of the American Secular Union adjourned sine die.

Crowded Out at the Congress.

If I can be allowed a little of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S space I would like to state an important point in my intended comments on the affairs of the American Secular Union which I was not permitted to say at the Congress, owing to the interruption and cutting short of my remarks by the President. Though called as a business meeting at a time when even the life of the movement seemed precarious, "we could not spare time" to consult about its vital affairs and needs, for, as it later eventuated, the President needed the time to announce his latest and greatest literary effort and invite all to buy his forthcoming book.

During many years and under different administrations it has become evident that the power of the American Secular Union to attract funds is limited to about $1 500, and of this, or a less amount during some years, the larger portion has been devoted to office expenses and Secretary's salary, leaving so little for activ work that we hav but little to show for the last six years' expenditure of about $9,000. If we could raise $5 000 a year it would no doubt be wise to use a fifth of it in official salaries to employ the other four-fifths wisely and well; but if we can expect only $1 200 or $1 500 the business should be planned in a way to use not more than one fifth or a fourth for salary and office expenses. We could not hav the full time of a Secretary at this rate, but we want a Secretary who will for $300 direct and employ $900 in useful propaganda rather than one who requires a salary of one thousand, leaving only two hundred to work with. I hoped before the nomination of next year's officers to hav introduced a resolution advising the policy above indicated, but few of the old reliable backers were there to vote on it, and it remains for the elected Board to decide the policy and lay out the program for the year of their administration. It is my personal opinion that unless some such policy be soon adopted by the new Board they will hav a good deal less than $1,200 to work with.

My title to discuss such matters was called in question by the President because my annual donation was not made this year, which was entirely owing to the fact that I had been waiting for the President to pony up something himself. At the time I choked myself off from saying that during his administration of three years the Foote family has contributed about $400 to the treasury of the American Secular Union, and, if I am not mistaken, the donation of Mr. Westbrook, who could buy us out five times over, has been $0.00.

In the American Secular Union the accomplishment of anything worth while depends largely on "funds," and secondly on the wise use of money subscribed. To attract funds from those who hav been its mainstay heretofore, I believe that the policy of the society must be altered, so that it shall conform in the main with that of the English and Canadian Secular societies, and that the employment of the funds will hav to be different from the methods of the past six years. We now hav new men. Let us soon hear if they hav any new plans. If not, they might as well cremate the remains, for "the old things hav passed away." E. B. FOOTE, JR.

A Pharisee Replied To.

It is doubtful if the Prohibitionists and the narrow pietists who constitute the Paul Prys of the world always realize the insolent impertinence of their actions, but a letter the Republican candidate for governor of this state wrote the chairman of the Prohibition state committee ought to open their eyes to some extent at least. The correspondence published in the Voice is interesting:

ELMIRA, N. Y., Oct. 1, 1891.

HON. J. SLOAT FASSETT, Elmira, N Y.—My Dear Sir: I am daily in receipt of letters from temperance men asking for information concerning statements now in print relating to your position on the temperance question. The statements they refer to are, that liquor is frequently upon your table, and drank by you, and that Sunday evening lunches, at which beer is served, are held at your house, and that at companies of young people held in your home wine is offered to those that gather there.

This may seem to you extremely personal, but you are a candidate for a high and responsible office, and these matters are important to the many voters who believe the liquor question to be the greatest before the people, and that no one should hold office in the state who is in any way in sympathy with that enemy of public welfare, the liquor traffic. These reports, if untrue, should be corrected, and if you will furnish me with an explicit denial of their truth I shall gladly publish it in our party papers, for we hav no desire to state anything in the canvass which is not absolutely true. Pardon me if I ask you for an early reply. I shall expect to hear from you, if you see fit to deny these reports within one week. Yours truly, FRANCIS E. BALDWIN.

To this letter Mr. FASSETT made the following reply:

ELMIRA, N Y., Oct. 3, 1891.

FRANCIS E. BALDWIN, ESQ, Elmira, N. Y.—My Dear Sir: Your favor of Oct. 1, 1891, is at hand. I regard it as an extremely impertinent letter. It is, in the first place, none of your business what the particular regime of my family life is; that is my business and the business of my family. Inside the doors of my house, my habits, and the habits of my wife, and the habits of my children and my friends, are nobody's business but mine. I hav read the newspapers of your party and the lying slanders that they are circulating about me and my personal habits throughout the state. It is not the first time that they hav circulated misstatements with reference to candidates for office, nor do I expect it will be the last time. Many Prohibitionists are conscientious Christian people, who believe that they are aiding the cause of temperance by their course.

I met one of the managers of the Voice once up in the North Woods, and I discovered that he was in the habit of drinking great quantities of whisky every day; but that was none of my business and none of the business of the world. When men are running for public office, the people are interested to know how they will discharge the duties of that office, not what they eat for breakfast or dinner or tea. My public record is open for the inspection of the whole world; my public expressions upon the question of excise legislation are open to the whole world; my public behavior as a public man is a proper thing for people to inspect and criticise.

I am informed that you are privately circulating misstatements with reference to my private life. I do not know whether the reports are true or not. I know that what I am told you are saying is as false as the father of lies. Now, my dear Baldwin, I hav known you as a more or less consistent church member, as a more or less upright and honest citizen. I hav never given myself any concern to inquire into the details of your habits; I do not know whether you are moral or immoral, and it is none of my business. Questions of morals are matters for men to settle between themselves, their consciences, and their God.

I resent your letter as as impertinence. I hav answered you to this extent simply for the reason that you are an old friend and neighbor. I do not know whether you will regard this letter as a private communication or not, and I do not care. This letter expresses my honest convictions. The great men of the world, who hav accomplished great things for the uplifting of mankind, hav not always conformed to your narrow code of moral ethics. Martin Luther, who gave the impulse to the Reformation, said that the man who did not love wine, woman, and song, remained a fool his whole life long; and yet I think Martin Luther was a pretty good man. He might not hav been good enough to please the secretary of the Prohibition party in this state, but he was good enough to do a great work for God and humanity and good government.

But bandying words with you I know is, at best, an idle and useless pastime. I cannot change your convictions of your duty, and I do not want to, but you must excuse me if I insist that what takes place in the privacy of my family, behind closed doors, is none of your business.

Very truly yours, J. S. FASSETT.

To Mr. Fassett's statement about one of the former managers of the Voice, the editor says: "Mr. Fassett's fling about 'one of the managers of the Voice,' concerns a gentleman, now dead, who was in the employ of this house for many years, in a clerical capacity, and whose only connection with the Voice was in attending to the presswork and making contracts for paper. What effect his association with Mr. Fassett in the North Woods may hav had, we do not know. As he is now dead, no denial of Mr. Fassett's statement can be made authoritativly. So far as we know his personal habits were not objectionable." And then, to be revenged, the Voice insinuates—it does not dare to say—that Mr. Fassett gets drunk. The Voice is sometimes a very pious paper, but it is common rumor around Astor place and Lafayette place that its editors are all Infidels. We hope the report is untrue.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

News of the Week.

ROMAN CATHOLIC Germans who with their ancestors hav farmed near Odessa and Kief, Russia, for a cen'ury. hav arrived at the New York Barge Office, complaining that they hav been compelled by continual petty persecutions by the Russian priesthood to abandon their farms and emigrate.

BRAZIL'S emancipated slaves will not work.

THE other night mobs pillaged and burnt the Jewish quarters of Starodoub in anger at the authorities having allowed the Jews to open their shops on Sunday.

WE may hav war with Chili over the affair of the 16th ult. in which Chilian sailors and police attacked United States sailors, killing two, wounding several, and imprisoning thirty five.

AT the Socialist congress in Germany a clause was added to the Socialist program demanding repeal of all laws subordinating a wife to her husband in public and private relations.

AT Pisa, Italy, a few days ago, a mob attacked six Austrian pilgrims to the Vatican and compelled them to shout, "Hurrah for the king!" Professor Ackerle among the pilgrims mysteriously disappeared, and is thought to hav been assassinated by the anticlericals.

THE bishop of Cahors having refused to celebrate a second mass in the church of the village of Murat, France, on Sundays, to convenience far-comers, the whole village, in consequence, hav become alienated from Catholicism and embraced Protestantism.

KENNAN says: "The czar's chief minister, Pobedonostsef, is a good representativ of the Inquisition of the Middle Ages, and the czar's conduct toward the Hebrews is mainly inspired by this cruel man. The czar and his ministers were in a railroad wreck several years ago, and, although their car was totally demolished, everyone escaped unhurt, and this escape the czar looked upon as a divine intervention of providence that he might continue to pursue the men who killed his father."

THE pope is preparing an allocution on the disorders at Rome He has written to M. Harmel of his bitter grief at seeing the French pilgrims "abandoned without provocation to the attacks of an ungovernable populace." He adds that he is deeply grateful to the pilgrims who came, and "to those who are prevented from coming by violence and iniquitous hatred" he sends his blessing. In writing to the archbishop of Aix, he deplores that the Roman rioters were allowed "to indulge with impunity in every kind of license, profaning church, insulting the pontiff, and maltreating the pilgrims." He hopes these incidents will not lead to "something more calamitous and lamentable." A Catholic correspondent in Rome complains: "The foreign Catholics cannot go abroad during the day in the city wherein resides their holy father. To cheer the name of the sovereign pontiff is a political offense and an insult to the country." He concludes ironically: "The proof that the holy father is free is that he cannot go out of the basilick or the Vatican; the proof that he is free is that his children cannot come together to testify to him their affection. Combined homage is forbidden. And how long will even individual homage be tolerated?" A Roman cardinal says: "You may be astonished at the folly of the government of the Liberals in driving away the pilgrims when it was to their interest to favor pilgrimages, and because this source of revenue for Rome and for Italy is now ruined in spite of its economic decadence. But it is necessary to go to the bottom of the matter. It is necessary to know that official Italy desired to teach a lesson to show that she has made up her mind to admit all excesses and to go to all extremes, and that, far from adapting herself to the new situation, she would prefer assassination or exiling of the pope, and the pillage of the Vatican." Rev. Dr. Phelan says: "The anticlerical mob cannot be held in check by the soldiers, and bloodshed and ruin will result whenever it is aroused. The attacks which were made upon the French pilgrims is only a slight eruption of this ill-subdued ferment, and it is to avoid that which prompts the pope to consider flight."

JOB HEARETH THAT SATAN HATH BEGUN OPERATIONS.—Job i, 14-19.

Gems of Thought.

ACCUSTOM a people to believe that priests, or any other class of men, can forgiv sins, and you will hav sins in abundance.—Paine.

THE law governing the relation of theology to disease is now before the world, and it is seen in the striking fact that just in proporion as the world progressed from the sway of Hippocrates to that of the ages of faith, so it progressed in the frequency and severity of great pestilences; and, on the other hand, just in proportion as the world has receded from that period when theology was all-pervading and all-controling, plague after plague has disappeared, and those remaining hav become less and less frequent and virulent.—Prof. A. D. White.

WHAT strange ideas of divine justice must Christians hav, who are taught to believe that their God, in view of reconciling to himself the human race, guilty, though unconscious, of the sins of their fathers, has put to death his own son, who was innocent and incapable of sinning! What should we say of a king whose subjects should revolt, and who, to appease himself, should find no other expedient than to put to death the heir to the crown, who had not participated in the general rebellion?—D'Holbach.

THERE are Christian people groaning in a triple slavery under monks who hav taken the vow of humility and poverty. You will ask how governments suffer these fatal contradictions? It is because the monks are rich and their vassals are poor. It is because the monks, to preserve their Hunnish rights, make presents to the commissaries and to the mistresses of those who might interpose their authority, to put down their oppression.—Voltaire.

NOTHING is more sacred, or can be more sacred, than the well-being of man.—Ingersoll.

IT is asked, If you take away the doctrin of the inspiration and infallible authority of the Bible, what foundation is left for morality? Those who ask the question believe that morality springs from the Ten Commandments, instead of the Commandments being the expression of human morality. Morality is the result of experience. That conduct which men hav found to produce the best results has been inculcated by maxims which superstition ascribes to the finger of God upon stone tablets. The experience of ages is compressed into the Golden Rule, of which, when quoted by Christ, it is said, "For this is the law and the prophets" (Matt. vii, 12); and Moses givs the precept, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." This rule and most of the maxims ascribed to Christ are found in writings centuries before he lived, and are the inheritance of the ages, needing no thunders of Sinai nor sufferings of Calvary to giv them authority.—Robt. C. Adams.

THE entire evidence for the antiquity of the Bible is of the most contradictory and unsatisfactory nature that it is possible to imagin. The first part of it pretends to hav been written by Moses some 1450 years before Christ, while Malachi, the last of the prophets, wrote so recently as about 397 years before Christ. Thus the writing of the Old Testament extended over a period of more than a thousand years. And yet, in the face of this, scholars bear testimony that there is hardly any difference between the Hebrew of the Pentateuch and the Hebrew of Malachi. How is this if more than a thousand years elapsed between the writing of Genesis and the writing of Malachi? How is it that there is really no difference between the Hebrew of the one and the Hebrew of the other? Was there ever, since the world began, a language that stood unaltered for a thousand years? What tyro in philology, acquainted with even the barest rudiments of the origin and growth of languages, will affirm that a living language ever stood still for even 300 years? Let even him who is no philologist at all compare the English of to-day with the English of Shakspere, and see whether they are by any means identical. Or let him go further back, and contrast the English of the Times newspaper with the English of Chaucer. It is not the half of a thousand years from now to Chaucer, and yet he cannot read Chaucer without a glossary. This will place him in the true light in which to see the monstrous fact (?) that there is no difference between the Hebrew of Genesis and the Hebrew of Malachi.—Saladin.

FROZEN OUT—A COLD DAY FOR THE CLERGY.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Peter's Pence from England at the last gathering amounted to less than $2,500. The pope is much displeased.

SAM JONES was the driver of a public dray in his nativ town before he became a preacher. His outfit was a small, rickety, rattling, ramshackle wagon, and an old sorrel horse. He was a familiar figure at the railway station, and his most profitable job was hauling drummers' trunks to the hotel.

SAMUEL W. BROWNE, city missionary of Biddeford, Me., believes that salvation should be free. He has been trying for some time to get the city to cut off his salary, but the authorities hav steadily refused to do so, and now the parson has sent in his resignation. The Biddeford people do not appreciate their missionary's disinterestedness, however. They say he is crazy.

NEW designs hav been made for silver subsidiary coins, under authority of Congress, and will soon be seen by the people. On the half and quarter dollar are the words, "In God We Trust," which are omitted on the dime. And yet five dimes will be worth just as much as the half-dollar, showing that trusting in God never increases the value of anything.

AT the Presbyterian church, Snohomish, Wash., two Sundays ago, the Rev. J. W. Dorrance rode a tilt against the Freethinkers. He said that they had been driven from the East and are now gathered on the Pacific coast. Mr. Dorrance suggested that they should all be slid down the Pacific slope into the sea. There was no room for them on shore. The Rev. Mr. Dorrance is a very pleasant party.

IN the New York State Library are twenty-six different portraits of Columbus. It was not believed until recently that a portrait of Columbus that had been painted in his lifetime was in existence, but Librarian Howell has announced that an original portrait has been found in the museum at Como. In the sixteenth century Paolo Giovio had a museum of paintings and statuary near Lake Como, and it has been presumed that he thought Columbus was as worthy of a portrait as of a statue in marble. It is known that the grand duke of Tuscany directed Christofana to copy nearly three hundred portraits in the Jovian Museum for the Florentine gallery, and that one of them was that of Columbus. The Massachusetts Historical Society has a copy of the portrait in the Florentine gallery.

A REMONSTRANCE against closing the World's Fair on Sunday was circulated at Snohomish, Wash., and over four hundred signatures were secured on one street alone, covering a length of thirteen feet of legal cap paper. The petition reads as follows: "The undersigned citizens of the United States of America, do hereby insist that the government of these United States is purely a secular government, in which all its citizens of whatever religious or non-religious beliefs hav equal rights. That the absolute separation of church and state should in all matters under the direction of the government be maintained. That we insist upon the right of all citizens feeling thus disposed having the right to visit such Exposition on Sundays as well as on other days of the week. That all citizens shall hav an opportunity to visit such Fair on such days as shall not conflict with their particular convictions."

CLERGYMEN are not advancing very fast in the direction of tolerance. The Rev. Dr. Thompson, Pacific coast secretary of the American Sabbath Union, spoke in Seattle the other day and said: "French people are undoubtedly the most wicked in the world. The reason is they hav no Sabbath. Soon we will hav no Sabbath here. Even now we hav seven-day newspapers, which transgress and desecrate our Sabbath with impunity. It was bad enough when we had them six days in the week, but now these seven-day issues are sacrilegious. The only way we can put a stop to this Sunday desecration is by combining all the churches in one society." What in the name of sense does the Rev. Dr. Thompson mean, asks a contemporary, when he says that "it was bad enough when we had newspapers six days in the week?" Does he contemplate a suppression of all the newspapers and a return to the good old times when priests were the only repositories and disseminators of information—those times called the Dark Ages? It looks that way. If Dr. Thompson wishes to see all Sunday labor cease, he should set an example to others by refraining from doing anything on that day himself. But, by the way, who would hav heard of Dr. Thompson but for the papers?

THIS is the way the Voice catalogs the sins of its fellow-Christians who will not vote for Prohibition: "At New Florence, Mo., a few days ago, sixteen church-members petitioned for a saloon. At Lees Summit, a village near Kansas City, fifteen church-members asked the county court to license the drunkard-making business. A few nights ago on the streets of another little Missouri town, the son of a prominent Ohio Methodist preacher, while drunk, shot down another young man, a member of the church. The shooter himself is a member of the Presbyterian church. In this same town the saloons were lately opened by the votes of church-members, one Protestant church giving three-fourths of its vote in favor of license. The writer has seen a member of this church go forward and, while beastly drunk, extend the 'right hand of fellowship' to new members. He has known a pastor in one of these churches who lost his place and salary because he opposed the saloons. One of the trustees of the Central Methodist Episcopal church, Stockton, Cal., whose pastor is the Rev. I. J. Carroll, a brother of the editor of the New York Independent, is a police and fire commissioner of Stockton, and in this capacity regularly grants licenses to the dram-shops of the city. Another trustee is a Republican lawyer, whose name appeared in print a few days ago with that of a saloon-keeper calling for the organization of a Republican league. How is this for a church which declares that to license the traffic is 'a sin?' The Non-partisan Temperance Union, of Wilkesbarre, Pa., recently, as is its custom, invited the pastor of the leading Methodist Episcopal church to preach a temperance sermon before the union. Its request, however, was declined, the pastor not deeming it 'practicable' to preach before the union. The superintendent of this same pastor's Sunday-school has for years rented a hotel for liquor-selling."

Selected.

Possibilities and Impossibilities.

From the Agnostic Annual.

In the course of a discussion which has been going on during the last two years, it has been maintained by the defenders of ecclesiastical Christianity that the demonology of the books of the New Testament is an essential and integral part of the revelation of the nature of the spiritual world promulgated by Jesus of Nazareth. Indeed, if the historical accuracy of the gospels and of the Acts of the Apostles is to be taken for granted, if the teachings of the Epistles are divinely inspired, and if the universal belief and practice of the primitiv church are the models which all later times must follow, there can be no doubt that those who accept the demonology are in the right. It is as plain as language can make it that the writers of the gospels believed in the existence of Satan and the subordinate ministers of evil as strongly as they believed in that of God and the angels, and that they had an unhesitating faith in possession and in exorcism. No reader of the first three gospels can hesitate to admit that, in the opinion of those persons among whom the traditions out of which they are compiled arose, Jesus held, and constantly acted upon, the same theory of the spiritual world. Nowhere do we find the slightest hint that he doubted the theory, or questioned the efficacy of the curativ operations based upon it.

Thus, when such a story as that about the Gadarene swine is placed before us, the importance of the decision, whether it is to be accepted or rejected, can not be over-estimated. If the demonological part of it is to be accepted, the authority of Jesus is unmistakably pledged to the demonological system current in Judea in the first century. The belief in devils who possess men and can be transferred from men to pigs becomes as much a part of Christian dogma as any article of the creeds. If it is to be rejected, there are two alternativ conclusions. Supposing the gospels to be historically accurate, it follows that Jesus shared in the errors respecting the nature of the spiritual world prevalent in the age in which he lived and among the people of his nation. If, on the other hand, the gospel tradition givs us only a popular version of the sayings and doings of Jesus, falsely colored and distorted by the superstitious imaginings of the minds through which it has passed, what guarantee hav we that a similar unconscious falsification, in accordance with preconceived ideas, may not hav taken place in respect of other reported sayings and doings? What is to prevent a conscientious inquirer from finding himself at last in a purely Agnostic position with respect to the teachings of Jesus, and consequently with respect to the fundamentals of Christianity?

In dealing with the question whether the Gadarene story was to be believed or not, I confined myself altogether to a discussion of the value of the evidence in its favor. And as it was easy to prove that this consists of nothing more than three partially discrepant, but often verbally coincident, versions of an original, of the source of which nobody knows anything, it appeared to me that it was wholly worthless. Even if the event described had been probable, such evidence would hav required corroboration; being grossly improbable, and involving acts questionable in their moral and legal aspect, the three accounts sank to the level of mere tales.

Thus far, I am unable, even after the most careful revision, to find any flaw in my argument; and I incline to think none has been found by my critics—at least, if they hav, they hav kept the discovery to themselvs.

In another part of my treatment of the case I hav been less fortunate. I was careful to say that, for anything I could "absolutely prove to the contrary," there might be in the universe demonic beings who could enter into and possess men, and even be transferred from them to pigs; and that I, for my part, could not venture to declare a priori that the existence of such entities was "impossible." I was, however, no less careful to remark that I thought the evidence hitherto adduced in favor of the existence of such beings "ridiculously insufficient" to warrant the belief in them.

To my surprise, this statement of what, after the closest reflection, I still conceive to be the right conclusion, has been hailed as a satisfactory admission by opponents, and lamented as a perilous concession by sympathizers. Indeed, the tone of the comments of some candid friends has been such that I began to suspect that I must be entering upon a process of retrogressiv metamorphosis which might eventually giv me a place among the respectabilities. The prospect, perhaps, ought to hav pleased me: but I confess I felt something of the uneasiness of the tailor who said that, whenever a customer's circumference was either much less or much more than at the last measurement, he at once sent in his bill; and I was not consoled until I recollected that, thirteen years ago, in discussing Hume's essay on "Miracles," I had quoted, with entire assent, the following passage from his writings: "Whatever is intelligible and can be distinctly conceived implies no contradiction, and can never be proved false by any demonstrativ argument or abstract reasoning a priori."*

Now, it is certain that the existence of demons can be distinctly conceived. In fact, from the earliest times of which we hav any record to the present day, the great majority of mankind hav had extremely distinct conceptions of them, and their practical life has been more or less shaped by those conceptions. Further, the notion of the existence of such beings "implies no contradiction." No doubt, in our experience, intelligence and volition are always found in connection with a certain material organization, and never disconnected with it; while, by the hypothesis, demons hav no such material substratum. But, then, as everybody knows, the exact relation between mental and physical phenomena, even in ourselvs, is the subject of endless dispute. We may all hav our opinions as to whether mental phenomena hav a substratum distinct from that which is assumed to underlie material phenomena or not; though if anyone thinks he has demonstrativ evidence of either the existence or the non-existence of a "soul," all I can say is his notion of demonstration differs from mine. But if it be impossible to demonstrate the non-existence of a "substance" of mental phenomena—that is, of a soul—independent of material "substance;" if the idea of such a "soul" is "intelligible and can be distinctly conceived," then it follows that it is not justifiable to talk of demons as "impossibilities." The idea of their existence implies no more "contradiction" than does the idea of the existence of pathogenic microbes in the air. Indeed, the microbes constitute a tolerably exact physical analog of the "powers of the air" of ancient belief.

Strictly speaking, I am unaware of anything that has a right to the title of an "impossibility" except a contradiction in terms. There are impossibilities logical, but none natural. A "round square," a "present past," "two parallel lines that intersect," are impossibilities, because the ideas denoted by the predicates, round, present, intersect, are contradictory of the ideas denoted by the subjects, square, past, parallel. But walking on water, or turning water into wine, or procreation without male intervention, or raising the dead, are plainly not "impossibilities" in this sense.

In the affirmation, that a man walked upon water, the idea of the subject is not contradictory of that in the predicate. Naturalists are familiar with insects which walk on water, and imagination has no more difficulty in putting a man in place of the insect than it has in giving a man some of the attributes of a bird and making an angel of him; or in ascribing to him the ascensiv tendencies of a balloon, as the "levitationists" do. Undoubtedly, there are very strong physical and biological arguments for thinking it extremely improbable that a man could be supported on the surface of water as the insect is; or that his organization could be compatible with the possession and use of wings; or that he could rise through the air without mechanical aid. Indeed, if we had any reason to believe that our present knowledge of the nature of things exhausts the possibilities of nature, we might properly say that the attributes of man are contradictory of walking on water, or floating in the air, and consequently that these acts are truly "impossible" for him. But it is sufficiently obvious, not only that we are at the beginning of our knowledge of nature, instead of having arrived at the end of it, but that the limitations of our faculties are such that we never can be in a position to set bounds to the possibilities of nature. We hav knowledge of what is happening and of what has happened; of what will happen we hav and can hav no more than expectation, grounded on our more or less correct reading of past experience and prompted by the faith, begotten of that experience, that the order of nature in the future will resemble its order in the past.

The same considerations apply to the other examples of supposed miraculous events. The change of water into wine undoubtedly implies a contradiction, and is assuredly "impossible," if we are permitted to assume that the "elementary bodies" of the chemists are, now and forever, immutable. Not only, however, is a negativ proposition of this kind incapable of proof, but modern chemistry is inclining toward the contrary doctrin. And if carbon can be got out of hydrogen or oxygen, the conversion of water into wine comes within range of scientific possibility—it becomes a mere question of molecular arrangement.

As for virgin procreation, it is not only clearly imaginable, but modern biology recognizes it as an every-day occurrence among some groups of animals. So with restoration to life after death. Certain animals, long as dry as mummies, and, to all appearance, as dead, when placed in proper conditions resume their vitality. It may be said that these creatures are not dead, but only in a condition of suspended vitality. That, however, is only begging the question by making the incapacity for restoration to life part of the definition of death. In the absence of obvious lesions of some of the more important organs, it is no easy matter, even for experts, to say that an apparently dead man is incapable of restoration to life; and, in the recorded instances of such restoration, the want of any conclusiv evidence that the man was dead is even more remarkable than the insufficiency of the testimony as to his coming to life again.

It may be urged, however, that there is, at any rate, one miracle certified by all three of the Synoptic gospels which really does "imply a contradiction," and is, therefore, "impossible" in the strictest sense of the word. This is the well-known story of the feeding of several thousand men, to the complete satisfaction of their hunger, by the distribution of a few loaves and fishes among them; the wondrousness of this already somewhat surprising performance being intensified by the assertion that the quantity of the fragments of the meal left over amounted to much more than the original store.

Undoubtedly, if the operation is stated in its most general form; if it is to be supposed that a certain quantity, or magnitude, was divided into many more parts than the whole contained; and that, after the subtraction of several thousands of such parts, the magnitude of the remainder amounted to more than the original magnitude, there does seem to be an a priori difficulty about accepting the proposition, seeing that it appears to be contradictory of the senses which we attach to the words "whole" and "parts" respectivly. But this difficulty is removed if we reflect that we are not, in this case, dealing with magnitude in the abstract, or with "whole" and "parts" in their mathematical sense, but with concrete things, many of which are known to possess the power of growing or increasing in magnitude. They thus furnish us with a conception of growth which we may, in imagination, apply to loaves and fishes; just as we may, in imagination, apply the idea of wings to the idea of a man. It must be admitted that a number of sheep might be fed on a pasture and yet that there might be more grass on the pasture when the sheep left it than there was at first. We may generalize this and other such facts into a perfectly definit conception of the increase of food in excess of consumption; which thus becomes a possibility, the limitations of which are to be discovered only by experience. Therefore, if it is asserted that cooked food has been made to grow in excess of rapid consumption, that statement cannot logically be rejected as an a priori impossibility, however improbable experience of the capabilities of cooked food may justify us in holding it to be.

On the strength of this undeniable improbability, however, we not only hav a right to demand, but are morally bound to require, strong evidence in its favor before we even take it into serious consideration. But what is the evidence in this case? It is merely that of those three books which also concur in testifying to the truth of the monstrous legend of the herd of swine. In these three books there are five accounts of a "miraculous feeding," which fall into two groups. Three of the stories, obviously derived from some common source, state that five loaves and two fishes sufficed to feed five thousand persons, and that twelve baskets of fragments remained over. In the two others, also obviously derived from a common source, distinct from the preceding, seven loaves and a few small fishes are distributed to four thousand persons, and seven baskets of fragments are left.

If we were dealing with secular records, I suppose no candid and competent student of history would entertain much doubt that the originals of the three stories and of the two are themselvs merely divergent versions of some primitiv story, which existed before the three Synoptic gospels were compiled out of the body of traditions current about Jesus. This view of the case, however, is incompatible with a belief in the historical accuracy of the first and second gospels (Matt. xvi, 5-12; Mark viii, 14 21). For these agree in making Jesus himself speak of both the "four thousand" and the "five thousand" miracle. "When I brake the five loaves among the five thousand, how many baskets full of broken pieces took ye up? They say unto him, twelve. And when the seven among the four thousand, how many baskets full of broken pieces took ye up? And they say unto him, seven."

Thus we are face to face with a dilemma the way of escape from which is not obvious. Either the "four thousand" and the "five thousand" stories are both historically true, and describe two separate events; or the first and second gospels testify to the very words of a conversation between Jesus and his disciples which cannot hav been uttered.

My choice between these alternativs is determined by no a priori speculations about the possibility or impossibility of such events as the feeding of the four or of the five thousand. But I ask myself the question, What evidence ought to be produced before I could feel justified in saying that I believed such an event to hav occurred? That question is very easily answered. Proof must be given (1) of the weight of the loaves and fishes at starting; (2) of the distribution to 4–5,000 persons, without any additional supply, of this quantity and quality of food; (3) of the satisfaction of these people's appetites; (4) of the weight and quality of the fragments gathered up into the baskets. Whatever my present notions of probability and improbability may be, satisfactory testimony under these four heads would lead me to believe that they were erroneous, and I should accept the so-called miracle as a new and unexpected example of the possibilities of nature.

* "Inquiry Concerning the Human Understanding," p. 5; 1748. The passage is cited and discussed in my "Hume," pp. 132, 133.

But when, instead of such evidence, nothing is produced but two sets of discrepant stories—originating nobody knows how or when—among persons who could believe as firmly in devils which enter pigs, I confess that my feeling is one of astonishment that anyone should expect a reasonable man to take such testimony seriously.

I am anxious to bring about a clear understanding of the difference between "impossibilities" and "improbabilities," because mistakes on this point lay us open to the attacks of ecclesiastical apologists of the type of the late Cardinal Newman; acute sophists, who think it fitting to employ their intellects as burglars employ dark-lanterns for the discovery of other people's weak places, while they carefully keep the light away from their own position.

When it is rightly stated, the Agnostic view of "miracles" is, in my judgment, unassailable. We are not justified in the a priori assertion that the order of nature, as experience has revealed it to us, cannot change. In arguing about the miraculous, the assumption is illegitimate, because it involves the whole point in dispute. Furthermore, it is an assumption which takes us beyond the range of our faculties. Obviously, no amount of past experience can warrant us in anything more than a correspondingly strong expectation for the present and future. We find practically that expectations, based upon careful observations of past events, are, as a rule, trustworthy. We should be foolish indeed not to follow the only guide we hav through life. But, for all that, our highest and surest generalizations remain on the level of justifiable expectations or very high probabilities. For my part, I am unable to conceive of an intelligence shaped on the model of that of man, however superior it might be, which could be any better off than our own in this respect; that is, which could possess logically justifiable grounds for certainty about the constancy of the order of things, and therefore be in a position to declare that such and such events are impossible. Some of the old mythologies recognized this clearly enough. Beyond and above Zeus and Odin there lay the unknown and inscrutable Fate which one day or other would crumple up them and the world they ruled to giv place to a new order of things.

I sincerely hope that I shall not be accused of Pyrrhonism, or of any desire to weaken the foundations of rational certainty. I hav merely desired to point out that rational certainty is one thing, and talk about "impossibilities," or "violation of natural laws," another. Rational certainty rests upon two grounds—the one that the evidence in favor of a given statement is as good as it can be; the other that such evidence is plainly insufficient. In the former case, the statement is to be taken as true, in the latter as untrue; until something arises to modify the verdict, which, however properly reached, may always be more or less wrong, the best information being never complete, and the best reasoning being liable to fallacy.

To quarrel with this uncertainty that besets us in intellectual affairs would be about as reasonable as to object to liv one's life with due thought for the morrow, because no man can be sure he will be alive an hour hence. Such are the conditions imposed upon us by nature, and we hav to make the best of them. And I think that the greatest mistake those of us who are interested in the progress of free thought can make is to overlook these limitations, and to deck ourselvs with the dogmatic feathers which are the traditional adornment of our opponents. Let us be content with rational certainty, leaving irrational certainties to those who like to muddle their minds with them. I cannot see my way to say that demons are impossibilities; but I am not more certain about anything than I am that the evidence tendered in favor of the demonology of which the Gadarene story is a typical example is utterly valueless. I cannot see my way to say that it is "impossible" that the hunger of thousands of men should be satisfied out of the food supplied by half-a-dozen loaves and a fish or two; but it seems to me monstrous that I should be asked to believe it on the faith of the five stories which testify to such an occurrence. It is true that the position that miracles are "impossible" cannot be sustained. But I know of nothing which calls upon me to qualify the grave verdict of Hume: "There is not to be found, in all history, any miracle attested by a sufficient number of men, of such unquestioned goodness, education, and learning as to secure us against all delusion in themselvs; of such undoubted integrity as to place them beyond all suspicion of any design to deceive others; of such credit and reputation in the eyes of mankind as to hav a great deal to lose in case of their being detected in any falsehood; and at the same time attesting facts performed in such a public manner, and in so celebrated a part of the world, as to render the detection unavoidable: all which circumstances are requisit to giv us a full assurance in the testimony of men" (Hume, "Inquiry," sec. x. part ii).

T. H. HUXLEY.

A Chicago Reporter Finds Colonel Ingersoll.

From the Inter-Ocean.

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll yesterday sustained his reputation for an ability to giv a thoroughly interesting talk upon any subject in which the public is or ever was interested. After his labors on Colonel Babcock's suit and the railroad case which brought him to the city, the genial pope stretched himself out in his room at the Grand Pacific, and found something worthy of earnest comment in every current topic from woman suffrage to horse-racing. His opinion of the former topic will endear him to the suffragists whatever they may think of his religion.

"I claim no right that I am not willing to giv to my wife and daughter and to the wives and daughters of other men," he said. "We will never hav a generation of great men until we hav had a generation of great women. I do not regard ignorance as the foundation of virtue, nor uselessness as one of the requisits of a lady. I am a believer in equal rights. Those who are amenable to the laws should hav a voice in making the laws. In every department where woman has had an equal opportunity with man, she has shown that she has equal capacity.

"George Sand was a great writer, George Eliot was one of the greatest, Mrs. Browning a marvelous poet—and the lyric beauty of her 'Mother and Poet' is greater than anything her husband ever wrote—Harriet Martineau a wonderful woman, and Ouida is probably the greatest living writer, man or woman. Giv the women a chance."

The colonel's recent election as a life-member of the Manhattan Athletic Club, due strangely enough to a speech of his denouncing certain forms of sport, was referred to and this led him to express his contempt for prize fighting, and then he said on the subject of horse-racing:

"The only objection I hav to horse-racing," he said, "is its cruelty. The whip and spur should be banished from the track. As long as these are used the race-track will breed a very low and heartless set of men. I hate to see a brute whip and spur a noble animal. The good people object to racing because of the betting, but bad people, like myself, object to the cruelty. Men are not forced to bet. That is their own business, but the poor horse, straining every nerve, does not ask for the lash and iron. Abolish torture on the track and let the best horse win."

Mr. Ingersoll did not think Blaine would be a candidate, but beyond that he had no information to giv. Apropos, however, of Blaine's conference yesterday with the president in regard to the Chilian insult to the United States flag he expressed himself strongly.

"In the first place I think that our government was wrong in taking the part of Balmaceda. In the next place we made a mistake in seizing the Itata. America should always side with the right. We should care nothing for the pretender in power, and Balmaceda was a cruel, tyrannical scoundrel. We should be with the people everywhere. I do not blame Chili for feeling a little revengeful. We ought to remember that Chili is weak, and nations, like individuals, are sensitiv in proportion that they are weak. Let us treat Chili just as we would England. We are too strong to be unjust."

To avoid talking of Harrison and Blaine, Mr. Ingersoll brought up the contest between the former's grandfather and Van Buren. "I can remember two incidents of the campaign of 1840," he said. "One was a procession in which the chief thing was a transparency representing Van Buren attempting to pick the lock of an iron box which stood for the sub-treasury, while Harrison stood over him with a club. Another was a handbill which urged people not to vote for Van Buren because he wanted negroes to be given the ballot if owning $250 worth of property, and claimed the vote of the people for Harrison because he had signed eleven petitions asking that Indiana be made a slave state, and that was 'grandfather's hat.'"

A Proposed Constitutional Amendment in Maryland.

From the Baltimore Sun

One of the objects of the fifteenth amendment to the constitution is to giv the legislature power to pass laws forever exempting church property, parochial schools, convents, graveyards, and parsonages from taxation.

Our present constitution provides "That every person in the state, or person holding property therein, ought to contribute his proportion of public taxes for the support of the government."

The third section of Bill of Rights of the United States Constitution declares: "No man can of right be compelled to attend, erect, or support any place of worship, or to maintain any ministry against his consent."

To defeat such wise provisions as these the proposed fifteenth amendment is intended. Exempting church property and church institutions is certainly contributing to the support of these institutions.

The state and city now make an equivalent of giving about $3 000 a year to the support of Mount Vernon M. E. church, about $5 000 to support the convent, corner of Park and Center streets, about $2 500 for the Eutaw place Baptist church, and so on, until it piles up a million or so for kindred corporations, but for humble little missions, struggling in a modest way to "work for the glory of God," it givs only an exemption of a few dollars!

Is this fair to the general taxpayer? Is it equitable to those who are content to worship God in an humble temple? Is it just to the non-church-goer, the Agnostic, the Turk, the Mongolian, and others who hav no sacred shrines here to worship? Would a temple to Joss be conducive to public morality? Yet would it not hav the same right to claim exemption?

Churches pay their preachers, their organists, their sextons, and their choir-singers, so why do they shrink from paying their debt to the state?

They claim to teach others to be honest, so why not set an example by being honest themselvs?

Two-thirds of the people do not attend any church, and why should they be taxed to pay for the other third, particularly when that other third is to a greater extent composed of a wealthier class of the people?

Why should the humble home of a struggling mechanic, or that of a wretched widow striving to keep a roof over her fatherless little ones, be taxed up to the very hilt, while a magnificent temple worth $300 000 goes scot-free? Is God so poor that he accepts favors of the state while his poorest creatures are driven by the tax-gatherers out to beg their bread? Has his church become so low as to be a pauper upon the state? By what right does it ignore the teachings of him who taught his followers "to render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's?" Can it be proven that the church is in such a condition as to actually need the support of the state?

It is now the richest organization in the world. If the money spent for its support was used to feed the hungry and clothe the naked there would not be a case of actual want in the whole world. A vote for the fifteenth amendment means a vote toward the more effectual union of church and state. While the defeat of the amendment will not force the various ecclesiastical institutions to stand a fair share of the public burden, it will nevertheless save our state from retrograding toward the terrible epoch of the world's history when church and state were practically united. The church then taught that "the powers that be are of God," but the forefathers of this country taught that "the power to govern comes from the consent of the governed."

Colonel Ingersoll Speaks of The Tendency of Modern Thought, and Other Things.

From the Chicago Tribune.

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll arrived in the city yesterday morning to try a case in the United States court. The case went over until to-day, giving the doughty skeptic an opportunity to secure needed rest. A reporter found him in room No. 33 at the Grand Pacific in company with his daughter Maud and a number of friends who had dropped in for the hearty handgrasp and the genuin welcome with which the apostle of the new faith invariably receives his visitors. A trifling increase in the silver tint of his hair is the only reminder that Col. Rob is advancing with the years. His voice is as full, his hand as firm, and his mind as vigorous and aggressiv as ever. The conversation naturally ran on theology and politics, and the colonel was asked:

"Do you regard the Briggs trial as any evidence of the growth of Liberalism in the church itself?"

"When men get together," replied Col. Ingersoll, "and make what they call a creed, the supposition is that they then say as nearly as possible what they mean and what they believe. A written creed, of necessity, remains substantially the same. In a few years this creed ceases to giv exactly the new shade of thought. Then begin two processes, one of destruction and the other of preservation. In every church, as in every party, and as you may say in every corporation, there are two wings—one progressiv, the other conservativ. In the church there will be a few, and they will represent the real intelligence of the church, who become dissatisfied with the creed, and who at first satisfy themselvs by giving new meanings to old words. On the other hand, the conservativ party appeals to emotions, to memories, and to the experiences of their fellow-members for the purpose of upholding the old dogmas and the old ideas; so that each creed is like a crumbling castle. The conservativs plant ivy and other vines, hoping that their leaves will hide the cracks and erosions of time; but the thoughtful see beyond these leaves and are satisfied that the structure itself is in process of decay, and that no amount of ivy can restore the crumbling stones.

WHEN A CREED WAS FORMULATED.

"The old Presbyterian creed, when it was first formulated, satisfied a certain religious intellect. At that time people were not very merciful. They had no clear conceptions of justice. Their lives were for the most part hard; most of them suffered the pains and pangs of poverty; nearly all lived in tyrannical governments and were the sport of nobles and kings. Their idea of God was born of their surroundings. God, to them, was an infinit king who delighted in exhibitions of power. At any rate, their minds were so constructed that they conceived of an infinit being who, billions of years before the world was, made up his mind as to whom he would save and whom he would damn. He not only made up his mind as to the number he would save and the number that should be lost, but he saved and damned without the slightest reference to the character of the individual. They believed then, and some pretend to believe yet, that God damns a man not because he is bad, and that he saves a man not because he is good, but simply for the purpose of self-glorification and as an exhibition of his eternal justice. It would be impossible to conceive of any creed more horrible than that of the Presbyterians. Although I admit—and I not only admit but I assert—that the creeds of all orthodox Christians are substantially the same, the Presbyterian creed says plainly what it means. There is no hesitation, no evasion. The horrible truth, so-called, is stated in the clearest possible language. One would think after reading this creed that the men who made it not only believed it but were really glad it was true.

"Ideas of justice, of the use of power, of the use of mercy, hav greatly changed in the last century. We are beginning dimly to see that each man is the result of an infinit number of conditions, of an infinit number of facts, most of which existed before he was born. We are beginning dimly to see that while reason is a pilot each soul navigates the mysterious sea filled with tides and unknown currents set in motion by ancestors long since dust. We are beginning to see that defects of mind are transmitted precisely the same as defects of body, and in my judgment the time is coming when we will no more think of punishing a man for larceny than for having the consumption. We will know that the thief is a necessary and natural result of conditions, preparing, you may say, the field of the world for the growth of man. We will no longer depend upon accident, and ignorance, and providence. We will depend upon intelligence and science.

SHOCKING TO THE AVERAGE MIND

"The Presbyterian creed is no longer in harmony with the average sense of man. It shocks the average mind. It seems too monstrous to be true; too horrible to find a lodgment in the mind of the civilized man. The Presbyterian minister who thinks is giving new meanings to the old words. The Presbyterian minister who feels also givs new meaning to the old words. Only those who neither think nor feel remain orthodox.

"For many years the Christian world has been engaged in examining the religion of other peoples, and the Christian scholars hav had but little trouble in demonstrating the origin of Mohammedanism and Buddhism and all other isms except ours. After having examined other religions in the light of science, it occurred to some of our own theologians to examin their own doctrin in the same way, and the result has been exactly the same in both cases. Dr. Briggs, as I believe, is a man of education. He is undoubtedly familiar with other religions, and has, to some extent at least, made himself familiar with the sacred books of other people. Dr. Briggs knows that no human being knows who wrote a line of the Old Testament. He knows as well as he can know anything, for instance, that Moses never wrote one word of the books attributed to him. He knows also that the book of Genesis was made by putting two or three stories together. He also knows that it is not the oldest story, but was borrowed. He knows that in this book of Genesis there is not one word calculated to make a human being better or to shed the slightest light on human conduct. He knows, if he knows anything, that the Mosaic code, so-called, was, and is, exceedingly barbarous and not calculated to do justice between man and man, or between nation and nation. He knows that the Jewish people pursued a course calculated to destroy themselvs; that they refused to make friends with their neighbors; that they had not the slightest idea of the rights of other people; that they really supposed that the earth was theirs, and that their God was the greatest God in the heavens. He also knows that there are many thousands of mistakes in the Old Testament as translated. He knows that the book of Isaiah is made up of several books. He knows the same thing in regard to the New Testament. He also knows that there were many other books that were once considered sacred that hav been thrown away, and that nobody knows who wrote a solitary line of the New Testament.

INTERPOLATIONS IN THE TESTAMENTS.

"Besides all this, Dr. Briggs knows that the Old and New Testaments are filled with interpolations, and he knows that the passages of scripture which hav been taken as foundation stones for creeds were written hundreds of years after the death of Christ. He knows well enough that Christ never said, 'I came not to bring peace, but a sword.' He knows that the same being never said, 'Thou art Peter, and on this rock will I build my church.' He knows, too, that Christ never said, 'Whosoever believes shall be saved, and whosoever believes not shall be damned.' He knows that these were interpolations. He knows that the sin against the Holy Ghost is another interpolation. He knows, if he knows anything, that the gospel according to John was written long after the rest, and that nearly all the poison and superstition of orthodoxy is in that book. He knows also, if he knows anything, that St. Paul never read one of the four gospels. Knowing all these things, Dr. Briggs has had the honesty to say that there was some trouble about taking the Bible as absolutely inspired in word and punctuation. I do not think, however, that he can maintain his own position and still remain a Presbyterian or anything like a Presbyterian. He takes the ground, I believe, that there are three sources of knowledge: First, the Bible; second, the church; third, reason. It seems to me that reason should come first, because if you say the Bible is a source of authority, why do you say it? Do you say this because your reason is convinced that it is? If so, then reason is the foundation of that belief. If, again, you say the church is a source of authority, why do you say so? It must be because its history convinces your reason that it is. Consequently, the foundation of that idea is reason. At the bottom of this pyramid must be reason, and no man is under any obligation to believe that which is unreasonable to him. He may believe things that he cannot prove, but he does not believe them because they are unreasonable. He believes them because he thinks they are not unreasonable, not impossible, not improbable. But, after all, reason is the crucible in which every fact must be placed, and the result fixes the belief of the intelligent man.

REASON TO DECIDE DR. BRIGGS'S FATE.

"It seems to me that the whole Presbyterian creed must come down together. It is a scheme based upon certain facts, so called. There is in it the fall of man. There is in it the scheme of the atonement, and there is the idea of hell, eternal punishment, and the idea of heaven, eternal reward; and yet, according to their creed, hell is not a punishment and heaven is not a reward. Now, if we do away with the fall of man we do away with the atonement; then we do away with all supernatural religion. Then we come back to human reason. Personally, I hope that the Presbyterian church will be advanced enough and splendid enough to be honest, and if it is honest, all the gentlemen who amount to anything who assist in the trial of Dr. Briggs will in all probability agree with him and he will be acquitted. But if they throw aside their reason and remain blindly orthodox, then he will be convicted. To me it is simply miraculous that any man should imagin that the Bible is the source of truth. There was a time when all scientific facts were measured by the Bible. That time is past, and now the believers in the Bible are doing their best to convince us that it is in harmony with science. In other words, I hav lived to see a change of standards. When I was a boy science was measured by the Bible. Now the Bible is measured by science. This is an immense step. So it is impossible for me to conceive what kind of a mind a man has who finds in the history of the church the fact that it has been a source of truth. How can anyone come to the conclusion that the Catholic church has been a source of truth, a source of intellectual light? How can anyone believe that the church of John Calvin has been a source of truth? If its creed is not true, if its doctrins are mistakes, if its dogmas are monstrous delusions, how can it be said to hav been a source of truth?

"My opinion is that Dr. Briggs will not be satisfied with the step he has taken. He has turned his face a little toward the light. The farther he walks the harder it will be for him to turn back. The probability is that the orthodox will turn him out, and the process of driving out men of thought and men of genius will go on until the remnant will be as orthodox as they are stupid."

"Do you think mankind is drifting away from the supernatural?"

"My belief is that the supernatural has had its day. The church must either change or abdicate. That is to say, it must keep step with the progress of the world or be trampled under foot. The church as a power has ceased to exist. To day it is a matter of infinit indifference what the pulpit thinks unless there comes the voice of heresy from the sacred place. Every orthodox minister in the United States is listened to just in the proportion that he preaches heresy. The real simon-pure orthodox clergyman delivers his homilies to empty benches and to a few ancient people who know nothing of the tides and currents of modern thought. The orthodox pulpit to day has no thought, and the pews are substantiallly in the same condition. There was a time when the curse of the church whitened the face of a race, but now its anathema is the food of laughter."

"What in your judgment is to be the outcome of the present agitation in religious circles?"

PEOPLE ARE ENJOYING THE PRESENT.

"My idea is that people more and more are declining the postponement of happiness to another world. The general tendency is to enjoy the present. All religions hav taught men that the pleasures of this world are of no account; that they are nothing but husks, and rags, and chaff, and disappointment; that whoever expects to be happy in this world makes a mistake; that there is nothing on the earth worth striving for; that the principal business of mankind should be to get ready to be happy in another world; that the great occupation is to save your soul, and when you get it saved, when you are satisfied that you are one of the elect, then pack up all your worldly things in a very small trunk, take it to the dock of time that runs out into the ocean of eternity, sit down on it, and wait for the ship of death. And of course each church is the only one that sells a through ticket which can be depended on. In all religion, so far as I know, is an admixture of asceticism, and the greater the quantity the more beautiful the religion has been considered. The tendency of the world to-day is to enjoy life while you hav it; it is to get something out of the present moment; and we hav found that there are things worth living for even in this world. We hav found that a man can enjoy himself with wife and children; that we can be happy in the acquisition of knowledge; that we can be very happy in assisting others; in helping those we love; that there is some joy in poetry, in science, and in the enlargement and development of the mind; that there is some delight in music, and in the drama, and in the arts. We are finding, poor as the world is, that it beats a promis the fulfilment of which is not to take place until after death. The world is also finding out another thing, and that is that the gentlemen who preach these various religions, and promis these rewards, and threaten these punishments, know nothing whatever of the subject; that they are as blindly ignorant as the people they pretend to teach, and the people are as blindly ignorant as the animals below them. We hav finally concluded that no human being has the slightest conception of origin or of destiny, and that this life, not only in its commencement but in its end, is just as mysterious to-day as it was to the first man whose eyes greeted the rising sun. We are no nearer the solution of the problem than those who lived thousands of years before us, and we are just as near it as those who will liv millions of years after we are dead. So many people having arrived at the conclusion that nobody knows and that nobody can know, like sensible folks they hav made up their minds to enjoy this life. I hav often said, and I say again, that I feel as though I were on a ship not knowing the port from which it sailed, not knowing the harbor to which it was going, not having a speaking acquaintance with any of the officers, and I hav made up my mind to hav as good a time with the other passengers as possible under the circumstances. If this ship goes down in midsea I hav at least made something, and if it reaches a harbor of perpetual delight I hav lost nothing, and I hav had a happy voyage. And I think millions and millions are agreeing with me.

DOING AS THEY MUST.

"Now, understand, I am not finding fault with any of these religions or with any of these ministers. These religions and these ministers are the necessary and natural products of sufficient causes. Mankind has traveled from barbarism to what we now call civilization by many paths, all of which under the circumstances were absolutely necessary; and while I think the individual does as he must I think the same of the church, of the corporation, and of the nation, and not only of the nation but of the whole human race. Consequently I hav no malice and no prejudices. I hav likes and dislikes. I do not blame a gourd for not being a canteloupe, but I like canteloupes. So I do not blame the old hard-shell Presbyterian for not being a philosopher, but I like philosophers. So to wind it all up with regard to the tendency of modern thought, or as to the outcome of what you call religion, my own belief is that what is known as religion will disappear from the human mind. And by 'religion' I mean the supernatural. By 'religion' I mean living in this world for another, or living in this world to gratify some supposed being, whom we never saw and about whom we know nothing, and of whose existence we know nothing. In other words, religion consists of the duties we are supposed to owe to the first great cause and of certain things necessary for us to do here to insure happiness hereafter. These ideas, in my judgment, are destined to perish, and men will become convinced that all their duties are within their reach, and that obligations can exist only between them and other sentient beings. Another idea, I think, will force itself upon the mind, which is this: That he who livs the best for this world livs the best for another if there be one. In other words, humanity will take the place of what is called 'religion.' Science will displace superstition, and to do justice will be the ambition of men.

"My creed is this: Happiness is the only good. The place to be happy is here. The time to be happy is now. The way to be happy is to make others so."

"What is going to take the place of the pulpit?"

A CHURCH ON A SENSIBLE BASIS.

"I hav for a long time wondered why somebody didn't start a church on a sensible basis. My idea is this: There are, of course, in every community lawyers, doctors, merchants, and people of all trades and professions who hav not the time during the week to pay any particular attention to history, poetry, art, or song. Now, it seems to me that it would be a good thing to hav a church and for these men to employ a man of ability, of talent, to preach to them Sundays, and let this man say to this congregation: 'Now, I am going to preach to you for the first few Sundays—eight or ten or twenty, we will say—on the art, poetry, and intellectual achievements of the Greeks.' Let this man study all the week and tell his congregation Sunday what he has ascertained. Let him giv to his people the history of such men as Plato, as Socrates, what they did; of Aristotle, of his philosophy; of the great Greeks, their statesmen, their dramatists, their poets, actors, and sculptors, and let him show the debt that modern civilization owes to these people. Let him, too, giv their religions, their mythology—a mythology that has sown the seeds of beauty in every land. Then let him take up Rome. Let him show what a wonderful and practical people they were; let him giv an idea of their statesmen, orators, poets, lawyers—because probably the Romans were the greatest lawyers. And so let him go through with nation after nation, biography after biography, and at the same time let there be a Sunday-school connected with this church where the children shall be taught something of importance. For instance teach them botany, and when a Sunday is fair, clear, and beautiful, let them go to the fields and woods with their teachers, and in a little while they will become acquainted with all kinds of trees and shrubs and flowering plants. They could also be taught entomology, so that every bug would be interesting, for they would see the facts in science—something of use to them. I believe that such a church and such a Sunday-school would at the end of a few years be the most intelligent collection of people in the United States. To teach the children all of these things and to teach their parents, too, the outlines of every science so that every listener would know something of geology, something of astronomy, so that every member could tell the manner in which they find the distance of a star—how much better that would be than the old talk about Abraham. Isaac, and Jacob, and quotations from Haggai and Zephaniah, and all this eternal talk about the fall of man and the garden of Eden, and the flood and the atonement, and the wonders of Revelation! Even if the religious scheme be true, it can be told and understood as well in one day as in a hundred years. The church says: 'He that hath ears to hear let him hear.' I say: 'He that hath brains to think, let him think.'

THEATERS DISPLACING CHURCHES.

"So, too, the pulpit is being displaced by what are called places of amusement, which are really places where men go because they find there a something which satisfies in a greater or less degree the hunger of the brain. Never before was the theater as popular as it is now. Never before was as much money lavished upon the stage as now. Very few men having their choice would go to hear a sermon, especially of the orthodox kind, when they had a chance to see Joseph Jefferson. The man must be a curious combination who would prefer an orthodox sermon, we will say, to a concert given by Theodore Thomas. And I may say in passing that I hav great respect for Theodore Thomas because it was he who first of all opened to the American people the golden gates of music. He made the American people acquainted with the great masters, and especially with Wagner, and it is a debt that we shall always owe him. In this day the opera—that is to say, music in every form—is tending to displace the pulpit. The pulpits hav to go in partnership with music now. Hundreds of people hav excused themselvs to me for going to church, saying they hav splendid music. Long ago the Catholic church was forced to go into partnership not only with music but with painting and with architecture. The Protestant church for a long time thought it could do without these beggarly elements, and the Protestant church was simply a dry-goods box with a small steeple on top of it, its walls as bleak and bare and unpromising as the creed. But even Protestants hav been forced to hire a choir of ungodly people who happened to hav beautiful voices, and they, too, hav appealed to the organ. Music is taking the place of creed, and there is more real devotional feeling summoned from the temple of the mind by great music than by any sermon ever delivered. Music, of all other things, givs wings to thought and allows the soul to rise above all the pains and troubles of this life, and to feel for a moment as though it were absolutely free, above all clouds, destined to enjoy forever. So, too, science is beckoning with countless hands. Men of genius are everywhere beckoning men to discoveries, promising them fortunes compared with which Aladdin's lamp was weak and poor. All these things take men from the church; take men from the pulpit. In other words, prosperity is the enemy of the pulpit. When men enjoy life, when they are prosperous here, they are in love with the arts, with the sciences, with everything that givs joy, with everything that promises plenty, and they care nothing about the prophecies of evil that fall from the solemn faces of the parsons. They look in other directions. They are not thinking about the end of the world. They hate the lugubrious and they enjoy the sunshine of to-day. And this, in my judgment, is the highest philosophy: First, do not regret having lost yesterday; second, do not fear that you will lose to-morrow; third, enjoy to-day.

"Astrology was displaced by astronomy. Alchemy and the black art gave way to chemistry. Science is destined to take the place of superstition. In my judgment the religion of the future will be Reason."

"Well, colonel, having closed out the theological department, the Tribune would like to know if you are still a Republican?"

INGERSOLL ON POLITICS.

"I am a protectionist and I believe in protection not so much on account of financial results, not so much because it makes or loses money, but I am a believer in a diversity of industries. I believe this nation should make everything that it uses, if possible. We should be as nearly as the circumstances permit a self-sustaining people. If we make everything that we use we will find employment for every kind of talent, for every aptitude, for all kinds of genius; whereas, if we hav fewer industries, we will hav millions of people employed in vocations to which they are not adapted. The greatest crop that a nation can raise is a crop of great men and great women; and we will never be a great success as a nation until we hav produced intellectually the highest. I think America to-day stands at the head of inventors; and had it not been for protection, had it not been for the fact that our manufactures hav been shielded by tariff, there would hav been, in my judgment, but few inventions. Men will not embark in any business unless they think there is a prospect of success, a chance of making money; and had there been no tariff there would hav been but few manufactures, because it would hav been impossible for our people to hav competed with the Old World, where there were two cheap things, labor and capital, both of which were high in the United States. Then the Old World had capital. Interest was low. The Old World had thousands and millions of people on the edge of starvation. Labor was low. I was reading yesterday a speech by McKinley at Cleveland, and in that speech he states that England has not been so very prosperous under free trade, and that the United States has not been such a terrible failure under protection. He states that in this country there are about eleven hundred paupers to each million inhabitants, and that in England—a country that enjoys the full blessings of free trade according to St. Gladstone—there are to each million 26,250 paupers. That is to say, in this country we hav one-tenth of one per cent of our population who are paupers, and in that country the paupers number over two and six-tenths per cent. Now it seems to me that the present condition of this country is a demonstration that protection will not destroy, and certainly the statistics as far as Great Britain is concerned do show that free trade will not of itself take care of the people. In this country this year we hav probably produced from the earth, from the mines, and from the workshops things to the value of $5,000,000,000. Of all people on earth we are the best fed, the best clothed, and the best housed, on an average; and all this has been done in spite of protection. But, as I said in the first place, the greater the diversity of industry, the greater, other things being equal, the development of brain.

HOW A NATION CAN GROW IGNORANT.

"There is another thing, coming to the mere matter of money: The man or the nation that raises and sells raw material will grow ignorant and poor. The raising of raw material does not require any particular intelligence in the labor. The consequence is that it remains ignorant, because man as a rule livs in accordance with his necessities and opportunities—especially with his necessities. Now, if instead of raising and selling raw cotton we sell cotton as cloth, as car-wheels, and in every possible form in which cotton can be manufactured, then we get in our country not only the profits of the raw material, but of the manufactured article. In other words, we get all the profit out of the cotton business that is in the cotton business. So, if we simply dig iron and ship it we remain poor; but when we put iron in every form in which it can be used we not only get all the profit there is in the iron business, but we develop the intelligence of the people; and there is a vast difference between the intelligence that digs the ore and the intelligence that makes the locomotiv. There is a vast difference between the intelligence of the man who simply digs in the ground and that of the man who constructs an engin capable of forcing a ship across the Atlantic in six days. So I might go on showing the thousands and thousands of things made out of iron, not only in the making of which there is profit, but the making of which develops the mind of the maker.

[Here the colonel entered upon a further application of his tariff doctrin, as well as upon opinions on the money and other questions, which utterances we shall take pleasure in laying before our readers next week.—ED. T. S.]

Lectures and Meetings.

NOVEMBER 13th Albert Chavannes speaks at the Manhattan Liberal Club, 220 East 15th street, on "Practical Nationalism."

W. S. BELL is now lecturing in Iowa. After finishing lecture engagments there and in Nebraska, he will go through Kansas, Texas, Arizona, over the Southern Pacific railroad to California. He wishes those desiring lectures by him to address him at Des Moines, Ia., 522 West Grand avenue.

THE Chicago Secular Union elected officers on the evening of October 25th for the coming year as follows: President, Horace Bennett; vice-president, James Abbott; honorary vice-president, E. N. Geer; secretary, George Borst; treasurer, John F. Geeting. The Union will hereafter hold two Sunday evening meetings, one at Fort Dearborn Hall, 181 West Madison street; the other at 116 Fifth avenue.

MRS. MATTIE KREKEL will spend the month of December lecturing in Texas and the following four months in Kansas, Nebraska, and Iowa. Her address this month is 363 Third street, Portland, Oregon; after that, care of Mrs. J. W. Grit, 448 Bryan street, Dallas, Texas. Mrs. Krekel has been lecturing in British Columbia to large audiences. At Victoria and Nanaimo the largest halls were insufficient to accommodate the crowds who wanted to hear the gospel of freedom. The Victoria Colonist, which usually will not admit anything complimentary of Freethought, says of her lecture in that city: "She eloquently handled her theme, and evidently carried her audience with her, judging from the applause which she received. The speaker held that the salient points of ecclesiastical law were but the result of a high plane of morality which had been reached and taught ages before Judaism was recognized as a religion. Mrs. Krekel disputed the assertion that common law was heaven-born or of divine origin, and held it was simply a compact among men to do what was right and just. Science, she maintained, had opened the book of fact, and the old doctrins of superstition were fast being supplanted by the reasonable tenets of the present. The lecturess kept her audience interested during her remarks, and showed herself to be a cultured and deep-thinking lady. She will be welcomed by a large audience should she come again."

Religion and the Church.

Where ignora ce is bliss,
'Tis folly to be wise.

All religions, all creeds, are based on ignorance. Superstition and bigotry are the twin children of ignorance, and the three combined are the founders, the pioneers, of all religions.

Ignorance produces fanatics, and fanatics create creeds and expounders of creeds.

The various religions do not appeal to man's reason or common sense, but they do appeal to his superstition, to his faith in the creed. Thus the entire religious structure is founded on faith, and his (man's) faith is based on superstition, the offspring of ignorance. Without superstition, what would the Christian (or any other) religion be worth? Eradicate superstition from the mind of man, prove to him that every cause produces a relativ effect, and that moment religion loses its hold on the mind and man becomes free. He no longer believes in the innumerable cruel acts of a man-created (so-called) merciful God. He no longer believes in the inconsistent and unnatural acts and incidents recorded in that greatest of impositions, the Bible. Reason teaches him that if there is a personal God, an immortal creator, who has the power to endow man with creativ attributes, this creativ power must be inherent with God. If this is true, from whom did God inherit his creativ power? Reason teaches man the utter absurdity of a doctrin that claims a beginning and an ending to God's chief work, the earth, and yet claims no beginning or ending to God the creator. Reason clearly shows man that if naught existed prior to the priestly account of the creation, then of a surety God must constitute a part of that chaotic nothing of which God made this world. It is reason that prompts man to reflect and investigate. It teaches him that books were produced by man. It teaches him that throughout thousands of years of this world's history there never was and never will be a book produced unless produced by man. Reflection shows man that just in the proportion that we are free of the galling chains of superstition, just in that proportion we strive to better our earthly conditions, and thus secure the many comforts that we enjoy today. We require better evidence than water changed into blood or wine to convince us that a man born of woman is the only begotten son of God. Man now reasons that if this wonderful creativ power, God, was all-powerful, it was just as easy for him to hav made man male and female as it was to be compelled to use a rib—stolen from the man—from which to make woman; and the chances are, if he had not noticed that the animals were male and female when he paraded them before Adam, he would never hav thought of poor Mother Eve at all. Again, it would hav been just as easy for God to cause a deep sleep to fall upon Pharaoh and his people and thus liberate the children of Israel, as it was to open a passage through a deep sea that his chosen ones might go over dry-shod. To my reason it would hav been much easier to hav held Jonah in Nineveh than to cause poor sailors to lose their cargo, and God be thus compelled to use great fish as ferry-boats. To my mind it is much easier to love a pure man than an immoral one; yet this God chooses such men as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Lot, David, and Amnon, and we find his only begotten son was not much better in the choice of his companions. Reason teaches us that life could not exist in a fiery furnace; yet God's word tells us of three men who lived in such a furnace, and—worse than all—that the smell of fire was not upon their clothes, neither was their hair or shoes singed or scorched. Now, if you do not acknowledge your belief in this lie, the God-saved clergy, to whom the people pay large salaries, will tell you, in tones of assumed pity, that you are lost, damned, yes, damned forever. Do they honestly believe what they preach? No, they do not; and, in proof of my assertion, we read accounts of the clergy voluntarily leaving their pulpits for opinion's sake, while others are asked to resign. Can any free, reasoning mind believe that there ever was a God who would giv such orders as the Bible God is supposed to hav given to Joshua? Can it be possible that a creator would destroy his works simply because they carried out the law created within them?

Can any reasonable man or woman honestly believe that God was exalted through having his son enter Jerusalem on the foal of an ass? If this man Christ actually was the only son of God, did he not know it? Did it become necessary to establish his title that he must ask his disciples in the coast of Cæsarea Philippi "whom the people thought he was" (Matt. xvi, 13–20)? And remember it was not the people, but it was Peter, who said, "Thou art the Christ, the son of the living God." And what was Christ's answer, in the 18th verse? "And I say, That thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church, and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it." Now, does not reason prove to our minds who the true author of these words was? It was a Roman Catholic pope, no one else. We are indebted to the church for all the damnation that we expect to receive in the future. Hell has been pictured to the old and young in such vivid colors, and the torments of the damned described in such a soul-harrowing manner, that the only wonder to my mind is that there are any sane people in this enlightened world. Can we wonder that it has required hundreds of years to produce such men as Humboldt, Voltaire, Paine, Ingersoll, and other noble, brave spirits? Just think of the blind, ignorant faith of a mother who could believe that hell was lined with infant skulls! And for such damnable doctrin as this we as a people pay the clergy large salaries and big pew-rents, and thus enable them to build costly edifices, which are untaxed, while the poor are begging at the very doors of the church, and the poor man who by patient industry and hard toil has managed to secure a small home or business is crushed to the earth by heavy taxation—yes, while the poor man and his wife deprive themselvs of many comforts that they may secure a home, the priest is presented with a palatial mansion and livs on the best that the earth affords and rides in the finest equipage.

What does he giv to the people for all the wealth and comfort which he enjoys? Does he giv health? Does he giv happiness? No; for by his teachings he makes life a hell on this earth and givs man no positiv hope for any happiness in the future; in fact, he cannot prove there is a future, but still he attempts to describe it and tell us the vocation of its inhabitants. Every particle of the material of which heaven is supposed to be constituted is taken from this sinful earth—streets of gold, walls of jasper, etc., etc.; even the angels are represented as the most beautiful women. We see no bearded angels in the Christian's illustrations, and the only vocation followed is playing thousand-stringed harps and singing hosannas; and to secure a passport to this indolent life we must renounce all our reason, all knowledge of nature's true laws, and rely solely on the words and the books of the church. What does the church giv to the people for the untold wealth that the church receives? Nothing. Nothing but lies—yes, lies and misery. Did they ever build a railroad, or a telegraph line, or a steamship, or a college of learning? No; not one. Their object is, and ever has been, to keep the people in ignorance. The penalty for eating of the tree of knowledge was death.

And for centuries the church has waded to its neck in blood to compel the people to observe its teachings. History, as a rule, does not lie. Any school-boy who has desired to know the history of the church from the days of Ezra to the present time knows her garments are dripping with the blood of the innocent.

Why do we support these drones, the clergy? Why do we giv our hard-earned money for such damnable teachings? Would not the world be better if we had a school or college for every church in the world and a teacher in place of hypocrits called preachers? I think we would. What is it that holds the masses to the church? Nothing more or less than superstition—the fear of this imaginary God, this man-created being; and just as soon as the phantom superstition is beaten back, the church must close its doors and discharge its preachers. It is strange, but nevertheless a fact, that in the state prisons of this state (California) there are not a dozen Infidels. No, they are all Christians, and the worst cutthroat carries the cross suspended around his neck in lieu of a halter; and what is stranger still, the countries from whence they came are the most religious, and at the same time the most ignorant. I sometimes imagin that there was a tree of ignorance, as well as a tree of knowledge, in the garden of Eden, and the first couple must hav eaten more of the former than they did of the latter, leaving the latter to be eaten by the people of the present century; for I tell you the world has not been fit to liv in until the past one hundred years. I wish from the bottom of my heart that every reader of this article would inflict a task upon himself by reading the Bible from beginning to end. At the conclusion I am certain there would be a few less church and Bible-believing people; and I will feel that others by my aid hav cast aside the scales of superstition and hav eaten of the true tree of knowledge.

English Notes.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKERS: I see from the religious papers that Mrs. Besant is still a subject of profound interest to many of your countrymen, and so I must not dispense with her and her Theosophy just yet awhile. The debate I recently referred to between herself and the Rev. J. J. B. Coles, M.A. (Oxford), and who made himself a name in this controversy under the pseudonym "Number Five," is to come off on November 10th, at St. George's Hall, Langham place. Mr. Coles will affirm the following proposition: "That the historical and esoteric explanation of the symbols of the serpent and the cross, as given by Madam Blavatsky, is both defectiv and misleading, and therefore, instead of throwing true light upon the signs and symbols of ancient and modern religions, is calculated to deceive earnest seekers after truth." To make the subject more attractiv limelight diagrams will be used as illustrations. One would imagin that the debate will be interesting reading, and it ought to be published for the benefit of those who cannot attend at the hall.

Another cause of excitement in London is a prosecution instituted by the home secretary, Mr. Matthews, who is, I believe, a Roman Catholic. The point in dispute is the right to send Malthusian literature through the post. You hav had similar troubles in America and will be interested in the course of present events. I hav seen the circular complained of and found nothing obscene in it whatever; although I can quite imagin that the Rev. Quiverfull would shudder at the practical suggestion to write for information as to how families may be limited by means of prudential checks. On excellent authority I hav it that the whole business has more in it than meets the naked eye. Mr. Matthews is a Catholic; Mr. Lushington is the magistrate; and Mr. Lushington's son is private secretary to Mr. Matthews. The real defendant is not the Mr. Young who is put forward for trial, but Dr. Allinson, the well-known vegetarian and Malthusian. A public meeting is to be held in the historic South place chapel (Dr. Stanton Coit's preaching-place) on October 23d. Most of the leading Malthusians are to be present to protest against this illegal interference with British rights. One would think we were in Russia, or subject to the tender mercies of a Tony Comstock, Esq.; but we are not, and mean to stick up for our rights.

Most useful amongst the Malthusians is that stanch old Freethinker, W. H. Reynolds, of New Cross. So far he has been the life and soul of the party. By his energy he has kept the society afloat; and his pleasant manner has smoothed over many small difficulties. Mr. Reynolds is a true-hearted Briton whom everyone likes, and who always means the best of business in whatever he undertakes. Dr. C. R. Drysdale is the president of the Malthusian League, and works hard for the cause. Besides his professional work, which is heavy, the learned doctor finds time to lecture on his pet "ism," and is always glad to prove to sinners the errors of their ways. His broad Scotch accent, added to his pleasant manner, always makes him delightful in conversation; but I do not remember to hav heard him giv a set lecture, and cannot tell what he is like in the circumstances. As editor of the Malthusian he is pretty well known; but he is not one of those men who push themselvs much into public notice, and he is generally heard of in connection with the work he never ceases to hav in hand. How useful Mrs. Besant would hav been in the present crisis! She used to be a stanch Malthusian; but now, alas! that has gone to the winds with her Socialism, Secularism, and everything else which is not Theosophy.

Two more items concerning that gifted lady. First, she has had a very successful likeness taken by Messrs. Walter & Stead, of London. It is "boudoir" size, eight inches by six, and the figure is three-quarters length. Mrs. Besant is standing in a pensiv attitude; the right arm is at rest by her side, whilst on the left, which is flexed, the massiv Mahatma ring, the gift of Madam Blavatsky, is conspicuous on the third finger, all but eclipsing the wedding-ring. Second; on the authority of the London Star, "Mrs. Parnell and Mrs. Besant are two women who, in different ways, hav helped to make history. It is not generally known that they are related. Both were Miss Woods. Mrs. Parnell is a sister of Sir Evelyn Wood and daughter of the Rev. Sir John Page Wood. Mrs. Besant is daughter of an Irish doctor who was first cousin to Sir John Page Wood. Consequently Mrs. Parnell and Mrs. Besant are second cousins."

Last Saturday evening at the house of Mr. Henning, a well-known figure at the Finsbury park and Hall of Science lectures, I had the pleasure of meeting Mr. Digby Besant and his sister Mabel. A pleasanter couple can scarcely be imagined. The daughter is a perfect counterpart of the mother, making due allowance for age; is a Theosophist, and is studying music. The brother, a year or two older, is somewhat quiet and reserved, like most chess-players, but by no means dull in conversation. Miss Besant has much of her mother's controversial nature about her, and has taken the chair for the great Theosophist on more than one occasion at Milton Hall. They will both be heard of some day.

One very useful member of the Freethought party, who is too often overlooked through his immoderate modesty, is Joseph Mazzini Wheeler. I doubt whether we hav a more incisiv and accurate writer in our ranks. He has none of the blustering criticism of John M. Robertson, yet is far more stinging in his remarks. Mr. Wheeler is not a big man, physically, and is of a very retiring nature, and is easily lost in a crowd; but Wheeler's pen is known wherever English Freethought literature is read, and it would be a black day indeed for the party were he by any chance to be lost. Mrs. Wheeler is a musician of power, and has often delighted the friends with her performances on the piano at their various feasts.

Writing of musicians leads me to another or two who are realizing the hope of many—the introduction of music into our "services." Miss Vance, of Milton Hall, is in touch with folks who can do it. She has her hands full of other matters as well. The outdoor stations at Regent's park and Midland arches depend upon her energy for maintenance. Milton Hall regards her as the boss of their show, and now the Hall of Science looks to her to provide the musical portion of the solemnity, and she has done so with marked success so far. Mr. Osborn was the first pressed into the service. He is the adopted son of Mr. Henning, already mentioned, and who is, by the way, an unsuspected relativ of Mrs. Besant's. Mr. Osborn has a wonderful facility for playing by ear, and plays many of his own compositions. In former days he and Mr. Henning sang some German duets when Mr. J. M. Robertson and I gave a three months' course of lectures at the Claremont Hall. I believe they are now willing to sing and play for the new hall at Finsbury park, where they are sure to be appreciated.

As another proof of the decline of Secularism in the suburbs of London, the Freethinkers are negotiating for the hire of the beautiful hall at Edmonton, six miles from London and famous on account of John Gilpin's ride. This hall is not at the noted "Bell," but close by at the "Angel." It is luxuriously furnished and the lectures are free; yet we hav a difficulty to get a decent audience. When we can arrange a debate with a "Christian" the hall is crowded to excess; but people dare not venture in for purely Freethought lectures. And so this time they are to be lectures on "Christian Evidences," though we shall be rather rough on them and those who profess to champion the frauds.

What It All Means.

Pardon the criticism, if it be one, of the writer, who claims to be, like yourself, a seeker after truth, wherever found, either in nature or any attainment of the human intellect in any age.

There seems to be some confusion of thought in the mental atmosphere of many of the contributors to these columns as to the interpretation of that Oriental book called the Bible, and with the literal construction placed upon its contents by the Occidental mind there is great danger of a total misconstruction of its real signification.

Civilization in the Oriental world followed the lines of what, to us, is an extravagant estimate of the spiritual side of man's nature. In fact, it took that bias from the earliest ages. This life was so evanescent that it was at best but a series of shadows or phantoms of the real life, which was eternal. Consequently when we read the Bible or other Oriental books we must always bear this in mind, viz., that it pertains to the mental states of man rather than to the literal conditions of the people of whom it speaks.

The garden of Eden is but an allegory relativ to the state of marriage and adultery, and our first parents, through their animal proclivities, hav tainted the race with the conditions of bestial lust rather than rational desire in their sexual relations. The redemption of the race is by a birth from the thought plane of the animal to the spiritual, or, in Oriental phraseology, to the heavenly, state of ideality; and all the great teachers of India as well as other portions of the Orient recognized this truth as the basic principle of redemption from the power of the lower or animal nature.

One thing we should never lose sight of in our studies of Oriental literature, and that is the recognition of a supreme mentality, called Brahm, Ormuzd, Allah, or, in the Hebrew idiom, Yahveh.

That there is a basis for the thought is seen in the necessity of mental power as a governing factor in this world, as the creature with the most brain rules those with less mentality. In the Oriental philosophy the necessity of a supreme ruler was more apparent in the world of spirit than here, for the theory of a spiritual universe without a mental power to govern would be an absurdity, as that world itself was a purely mental realm, where all subordinate minds resided after their transition from the form which clothed them here.

Hence the idea of a God was not irrational to the believers in the immortality of the mind, and it was but a step to the next theory, that this God was really the author of all life in all worlds.

Around these central ideas the Bible was constructed, and proportionate to the ignorance and animality of the people by whom it was written were the ideas transmuted or perverted from their original simplicity. It was from this grade of mind that modern theology arose, and it is largely from the same undeveloped mentality that it obtains its strongest supporters.

In reality there is no objection to the Oriental theory of a supreme mind governing the universe of mind and matter. Nor is there a rational objection to the idea that all life is tending upward toward a state of perfect expression of mentality either through the old Egyptian idea of successiv incarnations from the animal world to man, or the Hindoo theory of the redemption of the soul from animality of thought to spirituality of ideas. Either of these theories givs hope for the ultimate redemption of all life from bondage to suffering, or, as we term it, evil.

One criticism upon the assumption of many of your writers relativ to there being no knowledge of a spiritual life by anyone upon earth. When such minds as Alfred Russell Wallace stake their professional reputation on the demonstrable evidence of immortality, such statements by any writers betray a lamentable state of ignorance regarding the discoveries of science in this age. If it would add anything thereto, I would say that in a series of similar experiments in telegraphy, photography, and independent slate-writing I found Professor Wallace to hav been substantially correct, and he who imagins the world of science to be unable to cope with the problems of all forms of existence is one of the hopelessly ignorant who needs several incarnations to raise the brain power to the grade of a rational apprehension of facts.

It is because of this dense ignorance of the Occidental mind in its devotion to material evidences of being as the only stage of existence, that the spiritual side of life is so helpless in its present status of giving proof only to the few, instead of the many, as it should be able and would be if the mind power of the world desired it.

As it is, there is little desire or opportunity for it to be manifest, and as a consequence the world goes blindly on groping for light in the darkness of material conditions, and finding only what material conditions can bestow. It may be generations ere the struggling mass of men will emerge from the present strife of embryotic mentality of the spiritual order; but as all children must be born after gestation, so we may confidently expect that all minds will eventually emerge from the environment of spiritual gestation into the world of perfect knowledge of all life and its destiny. GNOSTIC.

Money.

The word money can only be properly applied to coined metal, which is used as a medium of exchange and a measure of value. To call circulation notes, i. e., promissory notes, wealth, etc., money is a careless use of language. All circulating notes that I ever saw were not money but promises of money either on demand or at some stated future time, and their value depends upon the ability and integrity of the promisor and the time of payment. When the United States issues a $10 demand note we know that the government can and will pay the $10 in coin on demand, and said note will pass for $10 without any force behind it to make it go. If the government issues a $10 note payable with coin at some future time, without interest, it will be worth $10 minus discount at the current rate of interest up to date of maturity, and it will increase in value at a regular rate from the date of issue to the time of maturity. The value of a coin is determined by the quantity and the degree of fineness of the metal contained in the coin, and it will pass current at the intrinsic, or bullion, value of the metal without any legal-tender act behind it to make it go. Any dollar which requires a legal-tender act behind it to make it go is a fraud. Fiat money is force money, and if it has force enough behind it to overcome the resistance it will go. We can confine water in a barrel and put it on a wheelbarrow and push it uphill; so we can make slips of paper, with the dollar-marks printed upon them, pass in lieu of dollars, if we can put force enough behind them to overcome the resistance in front.

The debtor class are now trying to get control of government and make it issue irredeemable, and consequently worthless, paper notes, and make them a legal tender for debts, and loan them direct to the debtors at a low rate of interest for them to pay off their debts and mortgages with. Such notes would hav no value in them to make them go, and no right but might behind them to make them go. This would be paying debts with force, and the creditor class will resist with all the force which they can command. And it appears to me that, as the creditor class are the wealthy class, and the debtor class the poor class, the force of resistance will be stronger than the propelling force. The party in resistance will hav good dollars, which will go voluntarily, to make war with, while the coercing party will hav only fiat dollars, which hav to be pushed to make them go, to make war with. No prophet is needed to tell us what the result of the struggle would be. Many people hav very exalted ideas of what government can do, and seem to think that government possesses the power of working miracles. We hav adopted the name dollar for our unit of value, and Congress hav provided that 25 8 grains of gold shall be called a dollar, and that 412½ grains of silver shall be called a dollar. Now, it could just as well hav 10 grains of gold called a dollar and 100 grains of silver called a dollar, but if it could giv these two dollars equal purchasing power, or a purchasing power equal to our present standard dollars, it would perform a miracle. Now, if a paper note is a dollar, why is the promis printed on it that the government will pay a dollar for it? Why not print upon its face, If you are not satisfied with this dollar, the United States will swap you another dollar for it on demand?

If a promissory note is money, why should anyone ever demand payment? And if a promissory note was money, we could legally pay a note with a note.

P. F. SHUMAKER.

A Voice From the West Indies.

The anger of God has fallen upon the island of Martinique with such a wrath that it has completely devastated the whole island.

Lately Martinique has been very unfortunate. The first visit from their creator was a few years ago when small-pox played havoc with the people. Then the big fire of Fort-de-France, which laid the whole town in ashes, and now a cyclone unparalleled in the history of the West Indies.

During the two hours that the cyclone lasted the whole population of the island was in terror and consternation—in instant fear of death. The man who had, alone, during those hours to defend a family, women and children, from the incessant and multiplied dangers of the storm, can claim to hav passed through one of those hours of anguish the mere recollection of which disturbs the reason, and to hav endured a torture not dreamed of in the imagination of poets. The roofs crumbling; the wreckage hurled about with the violence of grapeshot; the shocks of earthquake; the bare walls rocking, beneath the timbers launched as if from catapults against them, with a dull, ominous sound; the lurid glare of fire; the deadly howling of the raging blast—to stand amid all this, straining in one convulsiv clasp, with instant death impending, the trembling loved ones whom reason has abandoned, in abject terror imploring with clasped hands the pitiless element to spare but their lives, though life should be but misery—oh! the horror of such an experience.

The shipping is destroyed. Nothing remains of it. The city is gutted; not a single house but has been unroofed.

Much has been said about it. They lay the blame on their God—who must be, in their opinion, a vengeful creature to play such a game with them—for causing an unparalleled cyclone. All the elements were let loose by this divine protector. The thunder on the occasion was terrific, the lightning constant and vivid, the flashes coming from every point and seeming to meet and battle furiously.

Strong men lost their heads completely, and an officer in uniform, who had been dining at a hotel when the tempest burst and had not been able to get away, became raving mad. He declared that the anger of God was being vented upon the country on account of the wickedness of the people, and could only be propitiated by a sacrifice; whereupon he drew his sword, declaring that he would immolate the proprietor of the establishment and his family. He was mastered after a desperate struggle, and secured by his own sword-belt to one of the legs of a billiard-table.

So much for the ignorance and credulity of a large amount of the world's population, who lay the blame of any of the laws of nature to an imaginary being called God. If by chance an earthquake happens, even if a very slight shock, thousands are found kneeling in the streets or in their houses, perhaps under very dangerous walls, instead of clearing out. E. S.

EMPEROR CHARLEMAGNE, in a digest of what he intended to propose to the parliament of 811, thus expresses himself: "We wish to know the duties of ecclesiastics, in order that we may not ask of them what they are not permitted to giv, and that they may not demand of us what we ought not to grant. We beg of them to explain to us clearly what they call quitting the world, and by what those who quit it may be distinguished from those who remain in it—if it is only by their not bearing arms and not being married in public—if that man has quitted the world who continues to add to his possessions by means of every sort, preaching paradise and threatening with damnation; employing the name of God or of some saint to persuade the simple to strip themselvs of their property, thus entailing want upon their lawful heirs, who therefore think themselvs justified in committing theft and pillage—if to quit the world is to carry the passion of coveteousness to such a length as to bribe false witnesses in order to obtain what belongs to another, and to seek out judges who are cruel, interested, and without the fear of God——" etc.

THE Bible Picture Book, we take pleasure in saying, is now under way, and will be issued as soon this fall as the work can be done and done well. The price will be $1, and it will contain a great deal for that amount. In renewing for THE TRUTH SEEKER we hope our readers will not forget to inclose the dollar for it.

The Presbyterian Ostrich Puts Its Head In the Sand.

The Presbyterians are afraid to make an issue on heresy, and hav dismissed, so far as the New York presbytery can, the charges against Professor Briggs of Union Theological Seminary, which were to hav been tried beginning the 4th of this month. This is called a victory for Professor Briggs, but it is rather an avowal of religious cowardice and an awakening to the fact that any disturbance of Presbyterian "standards" would probably result in a very unpleasant shaking up of the creed and a final loss of many more men besides Mr. Briggs.

The presbytery met on the 4th instant, and remained in session one day. After hearing Professor Briggs's answer to the charges against him, which in substance amounted to a disclaimer of any heretical intentions, and an explanation of his speeches which allowed them to be twisted into orthodoxy, the presbytery, on motion of Dr. Van Dyke, and after a spirited debate, adopted this resolution by a vote of 94 to 39:

"Resolved, That the presbytery of New York, having listened to the paper of Charles A. Briggs, D.D., in the case of the Presbyterian church of the United States of America against him, as to the sufficiency of the charges and specifications in form and legal effect, and without approving of the position taken in the inaugural address, and at the same time desiring earnestly the peace and quiet of the church, in view of the declarations of Dr. Briggs, touching his loyalty to the church and the Westminster standards, and in view of his disclaimers of interpretations put on some of his words, deems it best to dismiss the case and does so dismiss it."

The defense made by Professor Briggs was technical. It traversed the form rather than the meaning of the formulated charges, and while he explained his position he retracted nothing, and is to-day a self-confessed heretic, and the presbytery, by dismissing the charges, allows a man who does not believe the Bible to be what Presbyterianism claims it to be, to remain in the church and to teach the young men who are to be the future defenders of their faith. A sample of Professor Briggs's defense is his reply to the specification of the charge that he does not believe in the Mosaic authorship of the Bible. He says:

"It is a fact that I hav taught and most firmly hold and assert 'that Moses is not the author of the Pentateuch, and that Isaiah is not the author of half the book which bears his name,' but Specification 6 does not indicate by what method of reasoning it brings this fact under the charge. It is irrelevant to the charge. If it be a valid offense, it ought to hav been made a ground of a distinct charge, and it ought to hav been definitly stated what relation Moses has to the Pentateuch, and Isaiah to the book that bears his name, according to the Confession, and in what way the doctrin stated by me conflicts therewith or with holy scripture."

If the church can accept that as a reply to the charge of heresy, and by dismissing the charge indorse the man who makes it, it shows very plainly that the church cares less for the substance of its faith than for the forms of church unity. It must be very much frightened at the prospect of a heresy trial.

The comments of the secular press upon the result of this trial are not less significant than the result itself. They show that the press recognizes clearly the position in which the Presbyterians found themselvs, and they tell the Presbyterians plainly that as a matter of policy they hav done well, but that they hav weakened their religion in strengthening the church. The Times also points out the difference between a trial for heresy now and in the day when the "spiritual" controled the secular arm. Of that time it says:

"A trial for heresy was a highly-interesting performance when it was certain that the tribunal by which it was conducted could control the temporal fate of the culprit, including even his life, and generally believed that it could foreshadow his eternal destiny. The worst that could hav happened to Dr. Briggs was to deprive the Presbyterian church of any special or exclusiv benefit from his biblical scholarship in depriving him of his livelihood as a Presbyterian minister and a Presbyterian professor of theology. It is not by any means certain that the tribunal could hav done so much as this. The recent termination of the Andover case indicates that, if the judgment of the presbytery had invaded any interests of the culprit so tangible that a court of law could be invoked to protect them, the judgment might hav been nullified, and in that case Dr. Briggs would hav continued to profess a liberal theology under the egis of a mandamus. There are not wanting evidences that some of the prosecutors of this case look back with regret to the times when a trial for heresy meant something, and when the founder of Calvinism was able to wreak upon Servetus his sense of the requirements of logic as applied to the scriptures. But this regret will not bring back those times, and it is quite absurd to expect any moral weight to be carried by the judgment of a body in which it was only by a narrow majority that the culprit was put on trial, although his inaugural address was before the members in all its enormity.

"Weighty as the address is, it would, perhaps, be attributing too much influence to it to ascribe to its merits alone the result it has attained. The truth probably is that the majority of the presbytery had already come to the conclusion that such 'heresy-hunting' as was involved in the trial of Dr. Briggs upon his inaugural address would be even more formidable to the church itself than to the objects of the inquisition, and that they were entirely willing to hav a decent pretext for dropping the case."

The Herald says what THE TRUTH SEEKER said three weeks ago:

"For many reasons the presbytery of New York is to be congratulated on its decision to dismiss the charges of heresy brought against Dr. Briggs.

"There would be much better grounds for congratulation, however, if the presbytery had reached this decision months ago.

"It would not now be in the somewhat disadvantageous position of having deliberately undertaken what it has not carried out.

"The good men who, like Dr. Birch, think they can not conscientiously suffer Dr. Briggs's views to go unchecked deserve, no doubt, every consideration for their honesty.

"But a heresy trial is a bad thing for any church, and this trial would hav split Presbyterianism wide open."

But the Sun discusses the question more fully, and its logic must be unpleasant reading for the ninety-four who voted to get out of the scrape as best they could. It calls the result an "evasion:"

"The dismissal of the case against Dr. Briggs by a large majority of the ministers and elders of the New York presbytery indicates that the body is afraid to go into a discussion of the questions involved. It is an attempt to avoid a dangerous controversy and an effort to escape the necessity of expressing an opinion as to the specific teachings of the accused heretic.

"The presbytery dismissed the case by the great majority of ninety-four to thirty-nine, because it desires 'the peace and quiet of the church,' and 'in view of the declarations of Dr. Briggs touching his loyalty to the church and the Westminster standards,' and 'his disclaimers of interpretations put on some of his words.' That is, it refused to defend the Protestant position from fear of the trouble and danger involved in the contest, and it proclaimed the novel principle that the law is to be interpreted and applied by the individual accused and not by the authority which makes the law. Whether a man's teachings are consistent with the doctrinal standards of his church is to be decided by himself and not by the church. He is to be his own judge and jury and the sole authority competent to decide his own case. That may be a very comfortable principle for the accused and a very convenient way of getting rid of the vexation of trying him, but where does it leave the church? When brought to the ecclesiastical bar the man has only to plead not guilty to be pronounced guiltless without trial.

"The New York presbytery has announced practically that the fallibility or infallibility of the Bible is a debatable question as to which a Presbyterian theologian may think as he pleases. The general assembly at Detroit last spring was of a different mind. It was not afraid of disturbing the peace and quiet of the church by standing by its standards. It would not accept Dr. Briggs's plea of not guilty as a settlement of his case, but inferentially brought him in guilty by refusing to confirm his appointment as a professor in the Union Theological Seminary. Thus the supreme authority in the Presbyterian church condemned him for the offense which the subordinate authority now refuses to consider. The whole church, as represented at Detroit, came to the defense of the Protestant position, but the New York presbytery dodges the responsibility.

"This is a very remarkable contradiction, and it implies, of course, that the case of Dr. Briggs will not be shoved aside by the evasion of the New York presbytery. It will remain to vex the councils of Presbyterianism until it is settled on its merits. Already the committee of prosecution in the presbytery has given notice of an appeal to the synod, and instead of having been quieted, the controversy will grow more violent. Great principles cannot be evaded. The trial of Dr. Briggs by the Westminster standards, and coincidently the trial of the truth of his position by the test of reason and scholarship, must go on the same, and can end only when the whole case has been submitted to the jury of the church and the public and a positiv verdict has been rendered. The objections of Dr. Briggs are of the nature of a demurrer only, and the case must be tried on its merits."

The other secular papers take substantially the same ground. It is generally recognized—and the recognition is also recognized—that the old Christianity is gone, and no matter how severely the sects may claim to stick to their creeds they do not dare to make them an issue. The "Higher Criticism" and the "New Theology" hav won, and if ever this case should be tried on its merits Dr. Briggs would be probably acquitted, though without question he has left the Westminster standards. John Calvin would hav made mighty short work of him.

A Sunday-School Story.

The sort of Sunday-school rot upon which the average pietist feeds mentally, and is satisfied with, is splendidly shown in the following article headed "A Community Without the Bible," clipped from a Western agricultural journal:

"Few people hav much idea what kind of a world we should hav if the Bible was left out of it. There are lands enough, however, without the Bible, filled with darkness, vileness, and barbarity. There are plenty of histories of lands that had no Bible—dark places that are full of the habitations of cruelty—and there are here and there families and communities which hav no Bibles, and which giv us little encouragement to hope for good where the word of God is ignored and rejected.

"Some time about the year 1870, certain skeptics founded in the state of Missouri an Infidel town, called Liberal. The liberality of 'Freethought' was seen in the exclusion of all churches, Sunday-schools, or preaching. It was proposed to hav one community free from the influence of priestcraft and superstition. What was the result?

"About this matter there has been considerable dispute. Some persons hav given the place a very bad name; others residing there hav denounced them as liars and pronounced their statements false. We hav no personal knowledge of the facts, but on the 29th of May, 1891, the writer was in Burlington, Kan., and a well-known business man there, Mr. Robert Williams, said to him:

"'In 1879, as I was passing through Missouri, I saw on my railway ticket the name Liberal, and knowing something of the reputation of the place, I thought I would get off onto the platform and take a look around. But just before we arrived there the conductor passed through the train and said: "All who want to stop at Liberal go into such a car." He then locked the doors of every other car on the train but that. When the train had started on and got out of Liberal, the conductor unlocked the doors again and passed through the train. Some one asked him why he had locked the doors, and he replied: "This is the toughest town in all Missouri."'

"His language did not savor much of church or Sunday-school, but he evidently knew how to take care of his train and his passengers.

"We giv this fact as a contribution to the history of a godless town. Mentioning the matter in a certain place, a man remarked that he had visited Liberal since that time, that there are now two meeting-houses and Sunday-schools there, and that they do not now need to lock the doors of railway cars when they are passing through the place.

"We giv these statements for what they are worth, supposing them to be reliable, and believing that whoever undertakes to establish a community or nation without God will speedily come to the conclusion that Plutarch reached more than 1,700 years ago, when he said that 'a city might sooner be built without any ground to fix it on, than a commonwealth be constituted altogether void of any religion.'"

The depth of ignorance or dishonesty which the writer of the foregoing has reached could not be lessened by any words of ours; nor could he be answered any better than by printing his story and letting the reader laugh at him.

Catholicism in Minnesota.

The Catholics hav found themselvs strong enough in Stillwater and Faribault, Minnesota, to take another aggressiv step against the public school system. They hav got the parochial schools in those places supported from the common school fund and the public schools made parochial schools by the simple trick of uniting the two and furnishing the teachers, being able to do this through the town school board.

An examination of the schools since the deal was consummated reveals the objects of the church, which, of course, everyone ought to hav known. The teachers are nuns wearing their usual garb, with beads and crucifixes and rosaries, and their main efforts with the children are to convert them to Catholicism. The walls of the school-rooms are decorated with Romish emblems, and over the teachers' desks hang large portraits of the pope. The town's superintendent of schools is a Protestant, and ordered these insignia to be taken down, but the teachers replaced them, knowing the power of the priests with the school boards.

The citizens of the towns and in Minneapolis are greatly stirred up by this state of affairs, and propose to test the legality of the union in the courts. The "Patriotic Sons of America," an anti-Catholic organization, held a convention in Minneapolis the last of October and raised money for the fight. The legal proceedings will begin with the service of an injunction upon the officials of the state, county, and city, restraining the payment of any money to the school boards of Stillwater or Faribault on the ground that the money is unconstitutionally used to support sectarian institutions.

An Issue in England.

The London Freethinkers are fighting over again the battle for the right of free speech and free mails, and it is on the same old issue as a text, whether a person has the right to write about restricting population and send his essays by post.

About six weeks ago Mr. H. S. Young was arraigned for advising poor married couples to keep their families small. The magistrate before whom he was taken allowed that his language was inoffensiv, but the bigots slandered every Englishman by saying that fear of consequences is all that keeps them virtuous, and that Mr. Young's essay was therefore highly immoral and indecent. October 23 the friends of Mr. Young held a meeting in Moncure Conway's old church, South Place Institute, and registered their protest against his prosecution. Dr. Drysdale presided, and in his speech stated why the prosecution of Mr. Young had been begun. It had been set on foot, he said, by Mr. Matthews, the home secretary, for sending pamphlets on the population question through the post. That prosecution was instituted under an act passed mainly to protect the post-office against senders of dynamite, but a very dangerous passage had slipped into it, which had been interpreted by Mr. Matthews and the social purity party as applying to Malthusian literature. Mr. Matthews, as a Roman Catholic, had endeavored in this way to stop the circulation of a most innocent tract. For a long time the Roman Catholic church had held the most decided and extravagant opinions on the system of parental prudence which was so universally practiced in France, and which was now becoming extremely prevalent in England, he was happy to say. Their doctrin was that the number of children should be restricted to the powers of the parents to feed and educate them properly. The pope in council, in 1870, had decided that that doctrin was a deadly sin; so that Mr. Matthews, in carrying out this prosecution, was only carrying out the injunctions of his priestly advisers and the social purity party. They need not blame him for that. He was only doing what he considered to be his duty. But he (the speaker) hoped that they, as Protestant English people, were not prepared to admit his right of searching any packet in the post-office in order to satisfy the opponents of free speech. This was nothing but a nefarious attempt to stifle discussion on an all-important question. In the name of morality Mr. Matthews was inflicting the greatest blow on true morality that could be conceived. He (Dr. Drysdale) was authorized to read to them the opinion of the Malthusian League on Mr. Young's pamphlet. The League met on Tuesday to consider the matter, and their opinion was that it was a perfectly decent and unobjectionable pamphlet, and that it was a most unwarrantable interference with the liberty of the subject that such a tract should be stopped by the post-office, and the sender heavily fined for transmitting it. Would they submit to this kind of interference from such bigots as Mr. Matthews and those who had prosecuted this pamphlet? Let them agitate for a repeal of this dangerous act of 1884, that had been so terribly misused, and by their sympathy and with their purses assist Mr. Young in his defense.

Mr. Drysdale was followed by Mr. Foote, of the Freethinker. George Standring, D. M. Bennett's old friend, Dr. Allinson, Dr. Alice Vickery, Mrs. Heatherly, and Miss Wade addressed the large audience. Mr. Young was himself present on the platform. He made an able statement of his case, and was very heartily applauded. Mr. Foote followed, and worked up the audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm. He pointed out that it was not a Malthusian meeting, but a meeting of defense of free speech and publication. On that basis, persons of all parties, so long as they valued liberty, could unite in supporting Mr. Young's right to use the post-office for the dissemination of his views.

In his paper Mr. Foote states the issue still more emphatically. Freethinkers, he says, are all bound to resist the claim of the post-office authorities to open letters they are paid for conveying. It is a perfectly monstrous claim; only tyrants could make it, and only slaves submit to it. Freethinkers are also bound to defend the right of citizens to discuss every social problem in decent language. The question at issue is not whether Mr. Young's opinions are right, but whether he has a right to express them. Those who cannot see this are blind; those who will not see it are cowards.

Opening letters is going farther than our post-office clerks admit they dare go; but no doubt it is done here, and we hav before now made our protest. We sincerely hope our English brethren will not flinch from the fight. If Mr. Young or anyone else desires to warn young married couples against the burdens of a too large family and to send his warning through the mail it is nobody's business but his own and the people's he addresses. The idea that it is immoral and indecent to restrict population is a theological superstition inculcated by the priests, who naturally desire as many dupes as they can hav. It is much better to thwart the will of God than to bring puny and sickly children into the world to starve. But if it were not so the right to discuss the question should be maintained, and it is certainly intolerable that post-office officials should be allowed to open letters not addressed to themselvs. There is too blamed much "government" in this world.

What We May Yet See Here.

What we may expect to see in the cities of this country when Roman Catholicism becomes the power it is striving to be was seen in Cork, Ireland, last week.

For many days previous to the elections political feeling had been very bitter between the Parnellites and the anti-Parnellites. The latter faction was led by the priests, who took part in the many fights occurring in the streets, in which blackthorn shillalehs played merry tattoos on opposing heads. One day the list of injured in the scuffles reached one hundred and ninety in number. The factions used stones as missils and the processions of each were stoned by the other. On election day troops as well as police were required to prevent still more bloody contests. Priests took part in the combats, armed with big sticks, and their political activity never ceased till the polls closed. They took up positions outside the polling booths, marking down their men, supervising their voting papers, marshaling their own forces, persuading, hectoring, and intimidating Parnellite voters. Mr. O'Connor, M.P., appeared in one of these scenes. He protested against the bullying of voters by the priests, and the police had to interfere. As many as thirty priests were counted at a single voting-place. Crowds of women from the slums of Cork accompanied their spiritual pastors, aiding them in this holy work. It was never doubted that the priests were powerful enough to bring in their men, and the confidence was not misplaced, for the priests won.

When the Romish church gets sufficiently powerful here Americans will witness something like the scenes in Cork. At present the priests do their work less openly, though their influence is given wholly to the party which will giv them the biggest favors in return.

Another Enemy Placated.

If the former secretary of the American Secular Union were secretary now she would probably congratulate herself upon having won this glowing encomium from the Independent upon an enterprise of the Union: "'Conduct as a Fine Art,' by N. P. Gilman and E. P. Jackson, is a book composed of the two essays which shared equally the prize of $1 000 offered by a Philadelphia organization for the best manual to aid teachers in public schools to instruct children in morals without dabbling in religious details. We heartily recommend the volume as one to which the average school-teacher can turn with the certainty of gain. Both essays are clear and forcible, the one by Mr. Gilman is strikingly so."

The Independent undoubtedly finds Mr. Gilman's essay the more congenial because its author is a clergyman, refers his readers to St. Paul (who refers his to "God"), and assumes that man possesses an imperishable soul as surely as that he possesses a sole to his foot. With all these there was no need of "dabbling in religious details." But dabbling in religion at all was never contemplated by the donors of the prize money to the Philadelphia organization.

Editorial Notes.

THE superiority of the Buddhist religion, or at least its emblems, over Catholicism has been demonstrated to our satisfaction. Three years ago Mr. George Newton brought to this office a Roman Catholic "miracle," in the shape of a flat silver woman two inches long, presented to the Virgin Mary by a man whose wife had recovered in response to prayer to the Virgin. A priest of course took charge of the "milagro," who sold it to Mr. Newton, with other trinkets, as old silver for the melting-pot. It now hangs on the editorial desk, useless except as a reminder of the superstitious ignorance of Roman Catholics. But a "miracle" came in the other day from a Buddhist temple in Kilani, Ceylon, of some utility. Like the other, it was a religious offering, in this case made to Buddha, and like the other taken care of by a priest. Mr. F. C. Dean, who has just returned from a trip around the world, coaxed it from the priest by a present of cash. It is made of five "sacred" metals—principally brass—is nearly six inches high, represents a man "affirming," has a symbol of the old serpent in the top of his head, is evidently a devout and thankful idol, and can be used as a paper-weight, or to strike matches on, and would be a handy thing to throw at the cat. So if we were to choose either religion, it would be Buddhism, because of its comparativly greater usefulness.

THE Herald last Sunday published a symposium headed, what is this state called life? Naturally the reporter asked this question of Agnosticism's greatest man, and this is what Colonel Ingersoll said: "Life is something I know nothing about. It is something that no one knows anything about except the ministers. They know all about it: the other smart men gave it up long ago." Mrs. Besant assumes to be wiser than Mr. Ingersoll, but we doubt if she explains it a bit more clearly in the following than he does: "The whole universe is a manifestation of central life which is present in every atom of matter. What we speak of as a thing living or dead is simply arrangements of matter which vary the manifestations of life. Even in a biological sense death involves new life. Doctors may be able to settle that any given body is dead quite to the satisfaction of a coroner's jury, but they don't even profess to know anything about the soul, and this is well. I am afraid their determinations would not be satisfactory to everybody. No, I cannot concede that there is one absolute principle; at least this is not conceivable. There can be no life without love; no love without a positiv and negativ—in fact, no thought or consciousness without this antithesis, this contrast, this comparison. Besides, if science and philosophy will talk of an absolute principle, why not hav two absolute principles? It is just as easy or as hard; you can take your choice."

Letters from Friends.

Christian Consideration Invited to Four Points.

AUSTIN, TEX., Oct. 29, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Being at leisure, I will drop you a few lines. First, the pleasures of heaven. Think of a mother in heaven with all the pleasures God can giv, looking down at her son in hell suffering the agonies of a thousand deaths. Would not that mother be happy? Second, the birth of Christ. Let some unmarried girl of to-day giv birth to a child and tell the public that God gave it to her. Would they believe it? No. Then why should we believe Christ his son? The girls of to-day are just as pure as those of olden times. Third, what became of the first Bible? It was burnt up in a fire, so history says, and the Bible we hav now has been translated over twenty-five times, but where did the one we hav now originate? Fourth, why should we believe this Bible any more than Grimm's fairy tales? The only difference is that the fairy tales hav not got the smut in them that the Bible has, and I do not think they are near as big a lie. Ever yours, LITTLE HELEN.

On Talking Jackasses.

OSWEGO, ORE., Oct. 17, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed you will find $10, for which please send the following goods: "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book," price $2 50; "Force and Matter," by Prof Ludwig Buchner, M.D., price $1.50; "Looking Backward," by Edward Bellamy, price $1, and two subscriptions for THE TRUTH SEEKER, one for myself and the other for a new subscriber. I am very much interested in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I like it better each week. I was just beginning to investigate Christianity at the time the founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER was in prison; it was one of Brother Bennett's books that crippled my theology. I like the pictures, too. They are excellent. I think they would be fine to illustrate the Sunday school lessons. Anyway, there is more sound sense in one of THE TRUTH SEEKER's pictures than there is in a whole bundle of Sunday-school trash. Besides, there is lots of fun in the pictures. Just think of Mordecai's good luck in getting the laugh on Haman. That beats the Sunday-school charts of Joshua and the sun, Elijah's fiery chariot, or Balaam and the jackass. Now, it is taxing one's credulity pretty heavily to believe those old stories—although I hav heard several jackasses talk about God killing himself to spite the devil for telling the truth to Grandmother Eve; therefore some jackasses are able to talk.

J. M. THOMPSON.

A Liberal Association Formed at Aspen.

ASPEN, COL., Nov. 1, 291.

MR. EDITOR: Allow me to say a few words to the Liberals of Aspen in regard to their organization which was to be effected after the lectures of J. D. Shaw, of Waco, Tex. I was chosen on the committee to draw up the Objects and Aims for the Liberal organization of Aspen, and at the appointed time said committee did not meet. I at my own personal responsibility sent a number of letters to those who had signed the Objects for a Secular or Liberal union, and after discussion pro and con we adopted and indorsed those which are the principles of the state of Texas Liberal Association:

1. To encourage the study of man in all his relations.
2. To seek to realize the truth in life.
3. To aid in those movements that tend most to the improvement of the individual and of society, and to the unity and freedom of mankind.
4. To facilitate the association of those who hav at heart, and hold dear, that absolute freedom of thought and expression which is the natural right of every rational being.
5. To inaugurate a system of positiv, tolerant thought, ethical culture, and practical benevolence, in which all Liberal-minded people can unite and work in harmony for the moral elevation, intellectual improvement, social well-being, and consequent happiness of the human race.
6. To secure to every child of this republic a secular education.

These we thought were Liberal enough, and got no farther than indorsing the above. We hav not met since, and hav not yet rented a public hall, but on the birthday of Thomas Paine hav a grand ball and a short talk, when we hope to meet many of the Liberals of Aspen. Those who wish to know more about the proposed organization can learn by calling on me at 787 Ute avenue.

Liberals cannot do better than engage the services of J. D. Shaw to lecture for them. WM. MASON.

EAST RANDOLPH, N. Y., Oct. 25 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I see by your excellent paper that Rev. Mr. Talmage has repented—that is, he is "born again"—and now he thinks only good should be spoken about the dead. I wonder if Colonel Ingersoll converted him. It may be as Rev. Mr. Talmage nears the twilight, the purpling hill of life's uneven and zigzag path to the grave, he thinks it best for him to reform and speak the praises of those who cannot speak back. Well do I remember how Doctor Talmage assailed the reputation of Paine, and Voltaire, and George Eliot. Well do I remember how the Christians cheered his abusiv and untrue statements. But Dr. Talmage is not alone; there are thirty-one million Christians in America, applauded by ninety thousand preachers who do nothing to increase the world's wealth, who acquiesce in this mean, contemptible business of speaking ill of those who do not patronize their gospel-shops or contribute to their support. And it is remarkable that so many women—intelligent, cultured ladies—will be hoodwinked and flattered by the very men many of whom turn unpolluted and cheerful homes into disreputable ones and then laugh at the ruin they hav accomplished. But Christians, like those who are not, are only human, and, I believe, just as liable to err as they were before. Their deeds convince me this is so, and I hav had experience with them I assure you. Professing a creed and praying to unknown powers mark the intellectual status of the one who does so. I believe with Jesus when he said, "A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit." And it makes no difference how many times you baptize a person, if they are dishonest they will be still. Hon. Mr. Holdridge said the other day: "Robert, I thought when that young man was baptized he would pay that debt, but I guess he'll hav to be baptized again before he does." I said, "I think that will make no difference with him, Hon. Mr. Holdridge. If it will, the sooner you baptize him the better, then I'll admit you are correct." Truly, R. R. JONES.

A Worker Against Our Intolerable Sunday Despotism.

PORTLAND, ORE., Oct. 29, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Pursuing your suggestions as set forth in your paper of the issue of October 10th, relativ to the opening of the World's Fair on Sunday, I drew up a petition addressed to the commissioners of this state, passed it among my fellow-employees of the Union Pacific System, and hav succeeded thus far in securing one hundred names; and mean to hav another hundred before forwarding it. I feel confident that if all our justice-loving friends would do as well there would be no hesitancy on the part of the directors to decide in favor of keeping the Fair open on Sundays. This is an affair of national importance and as such ought to be treated regardless of the church, which cuts no sort of figure in our nation's affairs.

I am an ardent admirer of your interesting paper, which comes to me regularly through the kindness of a relativ.

I inclose you herewith a copy of the letters addressed to the representativs of Oregon. Trusting that right will prevail, I am "yours for the cause," A. G. CLARKE.

PETITION.

MESSRS. MARTIN WILKINS AND HENRY KLIPPEL, World's Fair Commissioners for Oregon, Dear Sirs: Information has reached us, through a communication from Mr. Benj. Butterworth, Secretary and Solicitor-General of the World's Fair, that petitions will be received relativ to the closing of the Fair on Sunday, and which will receive due consideration when that subject comes up; therefore we, the undersigned, citizens and taxpayers of this city of Portland, Ore., desire to enter our earnest protest against the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday. In view of the Sunday closing thousands of our laboring classes who cannot possibly devote to it any other day of the week, will be deprived of a privilege that is their right as citizens, to view the display of the products of the art, agriculture, mining, etc., of not only our own country, but of the world. We hold that the churches as a unit hav no legal right to interfere in the affairs of state; therefore, we call upon you as our representativs of this state to present, impartially, all the petitions you may receive bearing upon this subject. Trusting that this may also receive your personal hearty approval, we beg to remain, yours truly, A. G. CLARKE.

(One hundred names, etc., to follow.)

The Monster Catholicism Sharply Lacerated.

ADRIAN, MICH., Nov. 1, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Copperheads can hardly be charged with meddling in our common schools and pulling down the flags—the school system does not interfere with that over-estimated class of people. The demonstration toward our school and flag matters is purely Catholic. If the Catholic religion is the simon-pure, unalloyed caper, and the pope is the vicegerent Christ on earth, and priests can for a pittance guarantee safe landing of souls, murderers or minor criminals, into heaven, why do they squirm and expectorate such venom when they are referred to? If their propaganda be infallible, why such uneasiness at what heretics may do or say concerning their sore-toed Christ at Rome or subordinates—liars and thieves—who for a consideration of hard cash can avert the calamity of hell, horns, hoofs, tail, and all, and place the soul of the shrived in Elysian realms? The hypodermically (so to speak) applied unction to the soul of the penitent is administered through a source more criminal than the absolved one himself—ten times more culpable. Our institutions are menaced. The old flag of the republic, the nation's trade-mark, is being tabooed. Our educational institutions are being assailed by priest and minions. If you are not of them you are a target, boycotted in your legitimate pursuits. For a trifle of Peter's Pence the priest can absolve the false swearer, the incendiary, or those perpetrators of fouler crimes. Is such to be tolerated in the midst of this free and patriotic people, the loyal Americans? That old incubus of cussedness at Rome is the devil-fish from which radiate tentacles gathering to its slimy embrace the unwary, as well as the vipers who prowl about seeking to absorb the life and liberty of this fair land. The pope is the head and center of infamy. He is not now absolute of all, as desired, but is wiggling to that distinction. The pope is the devil's kodak; he reflects his employer. The whole bent and aim of Catholicism is to exterminate every other moral or immoral faction that will not affiliate in its devilish method. The recent attack upon the flag, school, and teacher of an Indiana district was perpetrated by emissaries of the pope. You cannot lay the recent outrages to the door of the so-called Copperheads. I do not believe that there is a nativ-born Copperhead in the North who would be guilty of pulling down the American flag from a school-building, unless he be a Catholic. This monster, Rome, must be pruned of its grapnels and consigned to Tartarean influence. This government must take heroic measures to abridge the encroachment of the hydra, Catholicism. It is fast assuming the long end of the teeter-board, and unless effectually squelched will soon be the fulcrum, basis, the whole teeter-board. Copperheadism is a trifle to pope or Catholicism. O. S. BARRETT.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $17, to be used as follows: Apply $6 on my subscription; then send THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year to James H Penny and Charles W. Manly-Deshon, Sailors' Snug Harbor, New Brighton, N. Y., also one year to Mrs. Elizabeth Lenaghen, Harriman, Tenn. I see in THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 26th you say you will send it for $2 a year if some one will pay the $2. If some hav been quicker than myself and sent money to pay for the paper for these persons, then use this I send to supply some others who are in a similar situation. I hav been very busy or I would not hav taken ten days to mail this. The small draft of $5 send to the old veteran in Liberalism, Jeremiah Hacker. I am well pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER as treating on Liberalism, until it comes to Spiritualism. When it gets to that point it or many of its writers attempt to write about what any well-informed person on the subject can see at once they know nothing about. I sometimes wish D. M. Bennett could be in the editorial chair long enough to giv Wettstein a piece of his mind, as he did T. Winter, of Cincinnati, O., who was almost every week or two writing his anathemas against Spiritualism and Spiritualists. If Wettstein would read the works of Professor Crookes, Wallace, Zöllner, and Robert Hare on Spiritualism, if he is an honest man he would not, in my opinion, be guilty of writing such an article as his in THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 26th. He is much like Lancaster, of England, who attended two or three circles at Wallace's house and then gave his opinion of Spiritualism to the world. Not so with Wallace, who investigated the subject in every possible way for six years before he published his views in his able work on Spiritualism. Since such lifelong Freethinkers as B. F. Underwood and wife, G. H. Walser, of Liberal, Mo., and many others I could mention, hav been able to see the truth of Spiritualism, there may be some hope for Wettstein and our good Editor, but I do not think there is any hope for Sister Slenker during her earth-life. I see quite a number of our Liberalists are nearly over the bog, several of them editors of good Liberal papers. I think not one in a thousand has had the advantage I hav to investigate the subject of Spiritualism in all its phases of manifestation, as hundreds of mediums hav been at my house from a few days to, in many instances, one month to a year or more, as previous to Mrs. Frank's death, which occurred seven years ago last month, I kept an open house for all mediums who came, free of any charge, for a term of something over twelve years, besides entertaining those who came from a distance to investigate. It was no uncommon thing that their stay extended to weeks, as they frequently came from other and distant states and from the other side of the Atlantic. Among the mediums were many of the most noted of modern times. It is some thirty-seven years since I commenced to investigate the phenomena. I would like to state the circumstances and how I came to investigate, and some of my experiences, but my letter is already too long.

The Future.

LEXINGTON, KY., Oct. 30, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Luther seemed to untie a Gordian knot, as he broke up a congestion of thoughts, poisonous and diseased, scattering the same to the winds (great is the man who can bear the contempt of the world for a good cause), but Luther only flirted with the Truth, after all—he did not win her noble heart. Swedenborg remarked that the future world was contained in the present, but alas, the greatest causes are hidden, and revealed often by disaster and ruin. Anarchy requires the complete perfection of individuals, who are to be a law unto themselvs. There will be no enterprise or success in it without a leader of great abilities and courage, with that happy aggregation of intuitions so seldom seen—deep penetration into causes, with boldness to execute what he has the moral audacity, the synthetic conviction, to plan for the world's liberation. We want a genius. Voltaire says that custom is stronger than nature. But all preconceived notions melt before the fascinating sagacity of Li Hung Chang, the Chinese viceroy. A great military general must love life like the snail, and yet feel the burning ardor which may quickly consume the frail body. The world is filled with impure Anarchy, from which it has derived no benefit—wild pulsations; heart and brains undisciplined; passions ungoverned; no sacred purity and moral principle, without which a seventh heaven would change in one day into a hell. No weeding of the infant mind, which by the merest chance becomes that of a highway robber. This is free agency turned the wrong way. Education implies choice.

But are freedom's pure expressions incantations, which can call forth every virtue? Can the wings of Mr. Totten's millennium rise from such a chrysalis? Stronger motivs than the world has yet seen will soon present themselvs, to satisfy the burning love of activity which givs life to the heart of man. What is our duty? To liv in luxury, greedy and degraded? The great mind of Tolstoi is not thus easily pacified. Love is the strongest cement known. He has plenty of that, and of course knows the secret of the universe.

How is it with the man who crawls at the feet of the powerful, which practice soon degenerates into baseness?

Stern, honest independence, hail!
A man's a man for a' that.

A groveling spirit is a millstone around the neck of Liberty. If we hav not great leaders, of noble purposes, with a grand following, with everything useful in view, we shall before long be astonished by the presence of military commanders with their hosts, who like Tamerlane or Genghis Khan will swallow the fifth part of the world in their rage. The noble conceptions of art might save us. Then why should we stupidly listen to the news that there are parts of the world where armies are stationed, perfect and unapproachable, in firm drill and experience, waiting till civilization has finished its Christian banquet, gloated sufficiently over its weak delusions, its fairy-like tales of holiness and heaven, its vices and lies and murders; its feeding the rich and trampling the poor—waiting till the monster lies at their mercy supine and motionless like the boa constrictor?

A Christian Delegation Stopped This Man's Discussion.

SALIDA, COL., Oct. 1, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I should like a short editorial giving a concise statement of the time that Josephus flourished, and all his history is said to contain in relation to Christ. and whose history or histories would be the most reliable to consult in establishing the claim that that chapter in Josephus's works which relates to Christ is a forgery. On looking over the lists of different publications I hav failed to find where his history can be obtained. This, in discussions with Christians, is a very important fact to be acquainted with. Christians generally refer to Josephus in order to establish the fact, as they claim, that contemporaneous history sustains the New Testament account of a superior man called Christ, and at the particular time when it is said he lived. I am now having a tilt with some of the pious ones upon this point. I know that Gibbon and other historians state that Pliny, Seneca, and other ancient historians are silent upon this point, but so far as I know they do not mention Josephus.

Some time since, I held a discussion with Christians through the local paper here, and when it grew too hot the editor of the paper was waited on by a Christian delegation who claimed that their God had been insulted, and ordered Mr. Editor to desist, and he forthwith wilted. He cringed and fell at the feet of superstition, backing down into his hole, his teeth chattering. He meekly laid him down, submitted to be chained, and now feeds upon the crumbs that fall from Christian charity. This village is notorious for its do nothing kind of Antichristians. Notwithstanding the advancing intelligence and general progress that environs the people of a free government is constantly exerting itself and gradually lifting the dark curtain of hereditary superstition from the eyes of a progressiv race, the light must actually be forced upon them and held directly in their eyes before religious bigotry will admit a single truth. Inherited supernaturalism, the fabulous, the monstrous, that which neither the fool nor the wise man can possibly understand, is what the zealous supernatural religionists cling to most desperately. To undertake to persuade them that it is impossible to know the unknowable, is to them attacking all that is good and trying to demolish the superstructure of God and all that is ennobling. Having been nourished in the lap of credulity, I feel that I am capable of comprehending its pernicious effect, and the great difficulty of freeing oneself from the bias of maternal instruction.

Rejected Communication.

CHICAGO, ILL., Oct. 10, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I send you an article below just as it was returned to me from the Richmond press. After keeping it about two weeks they returned it to me without any comment. Here is success to you and your valuable paper. Giv them fits. Poke them up with a long pole. Some of them are too filthy to poke with a short one.

QUAIL ON TOAST.

"And there went forth a wind from the land, and brought quails from the sea, and let them fall by the camp as it were a day's journey on this side and as it were a day's journey on the other side, round about the camp, and as it were two cubits high upon the face of the earth. And the people stood up all that day, and all that night, and all the next day, and they gathered the quails. He that gathered least gathered ten homers; and they spread them all abroad for themselvs round about the camp. And while the flesh was yet between their teeth ere it was chewed the wrath of the Lord was kindled against the people. And the Lord smote the people with a very great plague" (Num. xi, 31-33).

This Bible story of the quails beats Munchausen's wildest imagination. Suppose we make some calculations as to the probable number of quails brought from the sea to the children of Israel. A Bible day's journey is thirty miles, and as it was a day's journey on either side of the camp it would be sixty miles in diameter. Now, square this and we hav 3,600 square miles; and if we calculate in circular measure. as should be done, it would be more, but we will use square measure only. Now, there are 27 878 400 square feet in a square mile. consequently there would be 100,362 240,000 square feet in 3 600 square miles. It says the quails were two cubits high. That would be thirty-six inches. Now take a box one foot square and three feet high and you can put in at least fifty dead quails, but we will say thirty live to be in reasonable limits. We now multiply the above number of square feet of surface covered with quails by thirty and will get 3,016,867,200,000—three trillion sixteen billion eight hundred and sixty-seven million two hundred thousand—quails, a number beyond human comprehension. There never has been this number of quails altogether on the earth in six thousand years. According to Moses there were 600,000 people in camp, but some commentators think that there were not more than 40,000. However, we will take the number given by Moses. This would giv every man, woman, and child 5,018,112 quails. Now, what would you think of the wisdom of a creator who would send you over five million of quails, even if you were hungry as a bear?

Then again, how could the people move about or do anything with quails three feet deep at every step? And just think how many would be smothered to death and die for want of water and food. Why, the dead ones would create such a stench that no human being could liv within miles of the place, let alone in the midst of them. It says the people stood up two days and a night and gathered quails. The people stood up, that is, men, women, and children stood up, two days and a night. Can anybody believe that all those people stood up for sixty hours? None but the most ignorant and superstitious could believe such stuff.

Now, if you will look in the same chapter you will see that the children of Israel were complaining to Moses what a good time they had when they were in Egypt, and what a bad time they were having in that desert land. Then it goes on to state that Moses promised them that he would call on God and see what could be done for them. Well, Moses did call on God, and he came down and they had a talk, and God promised the people meat. That was the food they wished for, and God said to the people, "You shall hav meat. You shall not eat one day, nor two days, nor five days, neither ten days, nor twenty days, but even a whole month, until it comes out at your nostrils." Now, does he fulfill his promis to the people? And it says the least anyone gathered was ten homers. Now, a homer is a little more than eleven bushels, so that the poorest worker gathered one hundred and ten bushels. Suppose we say they averaged fifteen homers, that would be 330,000 000 bushels of quails they all gathered. And it says, "They spread them abroad." Now, where did they spread them, seeing that sixty miles in diameter was covered three feet deep with quails?

It also appears that the Lord treated these people with cruelty, entirely the opposit of wisdom, goodness, and power—the attributes of a creator—for after all their hard work gathering the quails, cleaning, etc., and while the flesh was between their teeth, the Lord got mad at them and smote them with a very great plague, and thousands of them died and they never knew what for.

It is just such Munchausen stories as the above in the Bible that outrage common sense and reason, and make thousands discard the book altogether, notwithstanding there are many good things in it. I. C. KILGORE.

Those Financial Questions Answered.

CROOK, NEB., Sept. 23, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: My time being otherwise occupied since receiving THE TRUTH SEEKER of 12th instant, I did not see friend Shumaker's answer to my questions till this morning. When I read, "Money and the mechanism of exchange is a science with principles just as fixed and definit as the rules of arithmetic," I expected to find on reading friend Shumaker's answer some evidence of the truth of said statement, especially after being assured a little further on that the blaze of Colonel Ingersoll's "headlight" had flashed "upon the field." But lo, when I read that money was "coined metal," I felt to exclaim, surely the "ignorance" of the writer "is simply astonishing." No political economist will bear you out in any such definition of money as that, friend Shumaker. One of the greatest statesmen that this or any other country has ever seen, Henry Clay, says: "Whatever the government agrees to receive as payment of public dues, is money," etc.

Encyclopedia Britannica says: "Money is the name given to the commodities or articles which the people use as equivalents for their services and for whatever else they may hav to dispose of."

John Stuart Mill says: "The functions of money are performed by a thing which derives its powers of performing them solely from law, or the express will of the people, and this is quite sufficient to confer the powers, since nothing more is needful to make a person accept anything as money."

Buckley, in his "English History of Commerce," says: "When it is once clearly understood that gold and silver are not wealth, but merely the representativs of wealth, and that money is of no possible use to a nation except to measure [price] and circulate its riches, all the old notions of the supreme importance of the precious metals will at once fall to the ground."

Prof. John Maguire says: "Money is a token of sovereignty based on the powers of a nation to support its laws. The question of redeemability or convertibility is absurd. The power that issues money is supreme, and the idea of basing that token of supreme powers on a commodity, as gold and silver, or anything less than supremacy of a nation, is ridiculous in the extreme."

Charles Morgan, the great French writer and political economist, says: "When the laborer receives his wages in money he has not received an equivalent for his services or work, but only something which will enable him to get what he wants."

Money "is a medium of exchange, a representativ of value." All the value that money possesses is its legal value and what is given it by supply and demand. If money is not a creation of law only in the same "sense that a gunboat is," the flash of that headlight must hav knocked you crazy. I can build as many gunboats of the same dimensions as I choose, and no United States marshal or other officer of the law will get after me. But do not you go to monkeying or trying to make money. You see there is a big difference, after all, between the making of money and the making of gunboats. Money is a creation of law and nothing more.

3 In your answer to the third question, you speak of different kinds of money issued by the nation. There are, there can be, no different kinds of money. It is either money, or else it is not money. When you talk of different kinds of money, you are talking unscientifically, and something that would not square with any "rules of arithmetic."

4. The act of April 2, 1792, made the European, Mexican, Central American, and South American coins a legal-tender money of the United States. Over fifty years thereafter Congress passed an act withdrawing the money quality from all foreign coins. You see the law both makes and unmakes money, and it is clearly within the province of the government. No "usurpation," nor no one "wronged."

8. If "not called money," why, of course it is not money. Whether anyone would take it for what it was worth signifies nothing.

9 Bob's headlight played the very devil with you here. The money of each country would hold the same relation to business that does the money of to-day, and prices would remain the same, and all exchanges made between each other would go on just as though there had been no change as to the material used in making their money impress, and all balances would be made with what the parties wanted, whether gold bars or white beans were used.

10. The only possible means or way by which we can know the intrinsic value of any commodity or product is the uses it can be put to in advancing civilization and adding to human comfort and happiness.

11. In the comparison with other metals, zinc, lead, tin, copper, and iron all hav a much greater value intrinsically than gold or silver. In the manufacturing of implements and other uses they are much more conduciv to man's happiness. And your question, my dear sir, about the watch and spoon, if anything at all, is unadulterated sophistry.

12. That "they are coinable," etc., no one will deny, but that "they hav a high intrinsic value" is not true, nor is it the reason for their being used as a representativ token (money). The first President Harrison said: "If there is one measure better calculated than another to produce that state of things where the rich are daily getting richer and the poor poorer, it is a metal currency." The reason, sir, is that the few who control the gold and silver can force the many (who would hav no use for it were it not for the law making it money) to deliver up the products of their labor, because the law compels them to get it in order that they may make settlement with the tax-gatherers.

13. "Iron is worth about three cents a pound," etc. Thunderation! What will the boy say now taking lessons in "science" and arithmetic "rules?" There can be but one correct solution to any problem, masters, and you hav already said that money was "coined metal." Try again, giv us a good reason if you can, and while you are thinking about it see if you can figure out by those "rules" how the thing that represents something can be the something.

14. Yes, and one pack of beans is worth just as much as another pack of the same kind of beans, but that does not answer the question as to their value by a darn site.

15 "Just as many dollars as he can induce the other party to giv him" Oh, ho, that "headlight" says he would be getting gold and silver for it. After learned men solve a problem, they are of the same opinion—that they hav reached a fact.

16. "No more than the value of a bushel of wheat," etc. I never hav seen any law that said wheat or any other product should be worth just so much per grain or pound, but it does fix the value of 25 8 10 grains of gold at 100 cents. Greater or lesser dollars is bosh. You are very unscientific.

17. You do not answer. You stand in need of a little more science.

18. You say, "I think not." More "ignorance." It is indeed "astonishing." It has been almost constantly fluctuating and changing. See Frederick Eden's "Table of English Money." Also "Doubleday's "Financial History of England."

19. Who said it was not worth as much as coined gold? Coined gold will not buy one particle more of flour, potatoes, rice, butter, milk, sugar, postage stamps, or anything else in this country. A silver dollar is equal to gold in every spot or place. Somebody has been lying to you or else you hav run against another "headlight."

20. More ignorance. Not "because the cost of coinage was higher," but because it was claimed to be necessary to prevent exportation, lest the people be robbed of their small change.

21. Ignorant as ever. The fellows that carry their money in "sacks" or "carts" were never afraid of being caught "away from home." No, sir; it was one of the first steps to fasten upon us the British system of finance. Britain failed to conquer us with the sword and bayonet, but she will, with such fellows as you and Bob helping her, hav us cringing slaves to her tyrannous financial system in less than ten years.

22. The rich man will never climb "Jacob's ladder with" or without them either. They were not made for him.

23. Properly answered, would be: Stagnation of business, financial failures, in the one where leaving; a revival of business, thrift, enterprise, where going.

24. My dear sir, if I was trumping up a charge against you of a $10,000 debt when you did not owe me but $100, and your proof was good, you would be looking for a money of value made by law that you could make a tender before the court or a witness of that $100 legal value, and you would not care what that impressed legal thing was if it had the power to relieve you of all the costs of the case. As to which, you know, or ought to know at least, that unless you made that tender, though I only got the judgment for $100, you would hav all the cost to pay, and otherwise if your tender was a money of legal value the cost would be on me.

Money, my dear sir, is of all things the most valuable, and all that value which it does possess is given to it by law. It is made the representativ of all value, and also of your liberty. It frees you from debt with a kind of power that nothing else has or can hav. Money has many functions and much power. But, my dear sir, you nor Bob never has seen a dollar of money nor never will, and when you catch on to that scientific principle of what is money, you will know more than you do now. W. P. BROOKS.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Busybodies.

It is a fact, as I've been told,
That people in the days of old
Got rich in silver and in gold,
No matter what they bought or sold,
By minding their own business.

They did not try to wound one's fame
Or slander one another's name;
They cared not when you went or came;
They pleased themselves—you did the same
If it was our own business.

And if a man did what was right
In his own mind and in the sight
Of righteous law, by day and night
He went ahead and fought the fight,
Determined in his business.

But in degen'rate modern days
There's quite a change in people's ways,
And what a person does or says
Must be held up unto the gaze
Of every busybody.

And if you do not tell them, too,
Where you are going and what to do,
They get into such an awful stew,
They'll even watch and follow you—
These very busy bodies.

But if we take the pains to see
Who these same busybodies be,
We find there's not a he or she
Who has a decent history,
Among these busybodies.

But let us no more notice take
Of evil tongues; but for their sake
We'll hope and pray they soon may wake
From wickedness, and money make
By minding their own business.

The Results of Rum.

What doth result from this demon drink? Misery, mendicancy, woe, and want, and last, but not least, disease, despair, and death. Intemperance dwarfs our youth; it brings brutality upon the blushing cheek of beauty. It makes men murderers, and wives widows. It bears the torch of Tophet, and its tendency is to trammel the thought.

It makes fond fathers forsake their firesides, fair wives, and beautiful babies.

This demon drink drives men to desperation, and women to be waifs and wanderers.

This bottled beverage contaminates character, aud manacles the mind.

Alcohol is an abomination! a curse to civilization, a foe to freedom, and a friend to famin. This demon drink drives the dagger to the heart of doting mothers.

It brings beggary to our brightest and best boys. This spirit of Satan sends our sons to suicide, and makes our offspring outcasts and orphans. It drives our sisters to suicide. It makes our friends fear their fellow-man. It condones crime, and condemns character. It murders morality—a villain to virtue, and is pernicious to the pursuit of pleasure.

It vails and veneers vice, and hates human happiness, and also execrates that which ennobles and elevates. It is the shield of sadness which hurls men to madness. Its noxious result is the ruin of our nation. Rum ruins that which is royal and superb. It is tearless as it tears the white throat of youth, as they thoughtlessly totter to a premature tomb. It is a torchbearer of treachery, thralldom, thievery, and tremens.

It is the blood of burglary, the vim of villainy, the crumbs of crime, and incites the incendiary. It is the health of highwaymen, the tonic of thieves, the guest of the gambler, and the rendezvous of rioters and robbers. It is the vampire of virtue, and cobra of crime. It severs affection from the soul of the suitor and hurries him to the gallows. It is the inspiration of insanity, the companion of crime, and the bosom friend of beggary. It is the fell destroyer of the family around the fireside. It is the will-o'-the-wisp of tatters and termagancy.

It is a hemorrhage of the father's heart, and misery to mothers. It dissipates our daughters, and defiles our sons. Rum! It corrupts the citizen, pollutes politics, and destroys society. It is a libertin to our legislators, and a gehenna to the government.

Alcohol is an accursed stuff, and is Satan's phere. Rum is repugnant to reason.

Rum is a rebel.

Rum rots the velvety cheek of comeliness.

Rum breaks the body, and paralyzes the nurse.

Rum degrades, deforms, and deals despondency and death.

Rum means by its free use, misery, meanness, and malevolence. Oh! the tragedies that are daily enacted by this tophetic tippling. This evil should be eradicated by the strong arm of society. A home is a heaven when its occupants abstain from this accursed abomination! Otherwise, to contrast the comparison, a home is a veritable hell (that pagan myth) when its occupants are addicted to this hellish habit! I would counsel the lassies contemplating the connubial state to reject the suitor if he indulges in a social glass. Would you tolerate a man to touch your rosy face and round form whose breath bespoke a bacchanalian? Would you plight your troth to a man who tarried about the tavern regaling his roystering ragamuffins with time-worn, worm-eaten, weather-beaten yarns? Boys, do not pawn your birthright for pauperism. Do not exchange your inherited excellences for the almshouse, the asylum, or probably the penitentiary or hangman's halter. CHAS. D. MCBRIDE.

What Is a Fetich?

"What is a fetich?" asks one of our bright correspondents.

To answer concisely and to the point: It is superstition. The little girl who hugs her doll and talks to it, believing it knows what she says, is a fetich-worshiper. Ancient uncivilized and unenlightened people were great in their various kinds of fetich worship. High mountains, big trees, animals, goats, sheep, snails, crocodiles, great snakes and little ones, and other living creatures, hav been made use of as fetiches.

These are natural fetiches. Then there are made-up fetiches of wood, stone, iron, copper, etc. They are rudely shaped, in imitation sometimes of a human being. This sort of fetich is kept in houses and in temples built expressly for it. The silly worshipers think it can answer prayers, and carry presents to it as well as food; but if the prayers are not answered, they fall upon it in anger, and break it in pieces; yet they will immediately make another to take its place. Great festivals and feasts are made in their honor, and sacrifices of living creatures are offered up to them.

Fetich worship is yet carried on in some parts of the world among low, savage tribes. And many people among civilized nations still cling to fetiches, although they would resent the insinuation with indignation were one to tell them about their fetiches.

Blissful and a True Philosopher.

Little Tim and his widowed mother lived in a very destitute way and suffered for many things needful. The bedding was scant and one bitter cold night his mother took down a partition door to cover his high-sided bunk, or bed; after she placed it across the bed Tim said: "Mother, what do poor folks do who don't hav doors to cover up their little boys with?" Take things philosophically—make the best of everything. UNCLE JACK.

Her First Day at School.

There was a very timid little girl among the many new pupils who applied for admission to the Brooklyn schools when they opened the other day. She was from the country. It was her first month of living in the city. The teacher took down the names of the new children. The little girl from the country gave her name shyly. No one heard it but the teacher. She also told her the name of the street wherein was her new city home, but when she was asked the number she hesitated. She had never heard of numbers to the houses. The houses in the country did not hav numbers. But a bright idea struck her, and she answered brightly, "If you mean the rent, we pay ten dollars." Then everybody laughed, and the little country girl colored and was sorry she had come to the city.

Some Funny Answers.

For originality, not to say humor, commend us to the answers in examination papers. Here are two or three which an English bishop vouches for. A child was asked to giv some account of Oliver Cromwell, and volunteered the information that tbe "Protector" was very unhappy and dreaded assassination. On his death-bed he cried, "If I had served my God as I served my king I should not thus be forsaken in my old age!" Another, evidently with temperance proclivities, defined syntax as "a dooty upon spirits." One smart youth who was asked by an examiner "Could your father walk around the world?" was equal to the occasion. "No, sir," said he. "Why not?" "Because he's dead."

The Stupid Boy.

Never set a boy down as stupid because he does not make headway at school. Many of the most celebrated men that hav ever lived hav been set down by some conventional pedagog as donkeys. One of the greatest astronomers of the age was restored to his father by the village schoolmaster with these encouraging words: "There's no use paying good money for his education. All he wants to do is to lie on the grass on his back and stare at the sky. I'm afraid his mind is wrong." Scientific men hav often been flogged for falling into brown studies over their books, and many an artist of the future has come to present grief for drawing all over his copy book, and surreptitiously painting the pictures of his geography. Your genius, unless musical, seldom proves himself one in his childhood; and your smart and self-sufficient piece of precocity, who takes all the medals and is the show scholar of the school, often ends by showing no talent for anything beyond a yardstick. Sir Walter Scott was called stupid as a child, and it was not even considered at all to his credit that he was fond of "sich trash" as ballads, and could learn them by heart at any time. The boy who really worries you by being so unlike his bright brothers may be the very one who will make you proud and happy some years hence. Take that for your comfort.

Correspondence.

SOUTH BRAINTREE, MASS., Oct. 23, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: We are all Freethinkers in this family, and therefore we are not considered as good as other people; but it makes no difference, we do not feel bad about it. I shall go to the high school next year if I am alive, but I shall feel badly, because my present teacher is as Liberal as I am, and we hav fun in talking over different religious matters. There is a boy that goes to my school who told me the other day that I was going to hell. I asked him where it was, and he said it was under the earth. Now, if you can tell me where under the earth is, I should like to know. He is very sure that there is a place there. Yours very truly,

CHAS. SUMNER PAGE.

[Only the ignorant and bigoted believe in a literal hell in these days; and only the cruel and vindictiv desire that anyone shall go to such a place. Charley is worth a thousand such silly believers. Study hard, learn all you can, and pay no heed to any foolish trash uttered by the unthinking and weak. Be worthy of your illustrious namesake—Charles Sumner.—ED. C. C.]

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

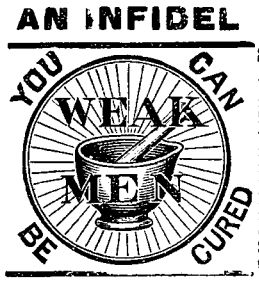
French Invasion of Ireland in '98.

Leaves of Unwritten History That Tell of a Heroic Endeavor and a Lost Opportunity to Throw Off England's Yoke.

By VALERIAN GRIBAYEDOFF.



With a map and numerous illustrations by well-known artists. Handsomely bound in silk cloth. Ink and gold side stamps. Price, $1.50.

The present volume is an effort to rescue from comparativ oblivion one of the many extraordinary episodes of the great French revolutionary war. . . . It points a moral that amidst republican institutions like ours, will not fail receive appreciation. It shows, on one hand, the elevating influence of newly acquired ambition, . . . and on the other the debasing effects of Religious and Political intolerance both on the tyrant and the victim. Contains a heretofore unpublished letter of Thomas Paine to the French Directory.

News of the Week.

A DISPATCH from Ireland says: "The priests hav influenced many of the electors who are adherents of the opposing faction by telling them that they were not bound in conscience to keep the pledges which they had made to the Parnellites."

SELECTION of the next pope from America is talked of.

MORMONS will soon control the entire state of Chihuahua, Mexico.

OWING to conspiracy to restore monarchy the Brazilian congress has been dissolved and military law declared.

THE corruption of the Russian court of public administration has been shown to be great, officers receiving five to twenty rubles a month being able to keep private secretaries at one hundred rubles.

CATHOLICS laud the late Bavarian king, though he was a foolish and bad man, because he resisted the extension into his land of the German "kulturkampf"—that is, battle for culture, in opposition to Catholic school control and obscurantism.

WENGHSIANG, China, reports that huge stones, for lack of which it had had to pause in building a breakwater, hav been hurled down from heaven. The governor of the district affirms their supernatural origin proved by one of them, as big as a house, bearing seal characters, two of which he has interpreted to mean "work" and "stone."

THE faction which controls Chili is said to be practically owned by English commercial firms. The Chilian press thinks it feasible to procure English aid if the United States declares war. Our cabinet's intentions are unknown.

ON the papal situation Dr. Phelan says: "No, I would not consider the exit of the pope a political move, a coup d'etat as it were, which would bring to the immediate notice of the powers his exact helplessness. If he leaves Rome it will be only because he has been forced to it to insure personal safety. He will not leave Rome with the object of returning to his ancient inheritance the more speedily."

THE German emperor has urged suppression of prostitutes and their "bullies"—the class known in France as "Alphonse" and in Germany as "Ludwige"—showing a commendable intention but advising unprecedented and unwise measures. His suggestions that lawyers refuse to defend immoral cases and that the public be excluded from such trials are condemned by the press as distinct back steps in legal procedure, imperiling the pure and independent administration of the law.

ITALY concurs in England's view that we should not enforce of Chili a reparation whose counterpart we denied Italy in the New Orleans affair. The Italia says: "The United States hav one diplomatic rule for Chili and another for Italy. All Yankees unscrupulously follow politics as a business, even when international affairs are concerned. But the time may come when Europe will lav aside petty differences and call the United States to a more exact and precise notion of the law of nations."

IN Russia scores of thousands hav died of starvation and 32,000,000 are on the verge of it and will perish without foreign aid. "Such a situation," says a report, "is without comparable precedent in modern history." And it is due solely to Christianity and despotism. In Orel outlawry prevails altogether. At Larvierze many spinners and weavers rioting for bread hav been killed by soldiers. The population of all Astrakhan is dying. Many villages in Perm are totally deserted Half the population of Beszan is dead. Poisonous herbs and earths are eaten. Samples of bread analyzed show seventy per cent sand and thirty per cent deleterious vegetable matter. A woman of Ratchine on returning from a search for food found all her children dead, their stomachs filled with earth and rags. In Penza the body of a woman who had died of heart disease was exhumed and eaten. Other cases of cannibalism are reported, especially of mothers eating their children in Nijni-Novgorod. Fields, houses, and railroad cars containing grain are despoiled. Trade is at a standstill, as the Jews are calling in every cent to leave the country.

Gems of Thought.

WE should do justice whether a woman was made from a rib or from "omnipotence." We should be merciful whether the flood was general, or local. We should be kind and obliging whether Jonah was swallowed by a fish or not.—Ingersoll.

FAR from being a check upon the passions of kings, religion, by its very principles, frees them from all restraint. It transforms them into divinities, whose caprice the people are never permitted to resist. While it givs up the reins to princes, and on their part breaks the bonds of the social compact, it endeavors to chain the mind and hands of their oppressed subjects.—D'Holbach.

STRIKING has been the history of hygiene in France; thanks to the decline of theological control over the universities, to the abolition of monasteries, and to such labors in hygienic research and improvement as those of a succession of men like Tardieu, Levy, and Bouchardat, a wondrous change has been wrought in public health. Statistics carefully kept show that the mean length of human life has been remarkably increased. In the eighteenth century it was but twenty-three years; from 1825 to 1830 it was thirty-two years and eight months; and since 1864, thirty-seven years and six months.—Prof. A. D. White.

FANATICISM is, in reference to superstition, what delirium is to fever, or rage to anger. He who is involved in ecstasies and visions, who takes dreams for realities, and his own imaginations for prophecies, is a fanatical novice of great hope and promis, and will probably soon advance to the highest form, and kill man for the love of God.—Voltaire.

MAN'S ignorance has always taken refuge in the act of God as an explanation of what could not be understood. God was supposed to cause cholera, plague, and small-pox by direct exercise of his will, until the germ theory of disease showed that these calamities could be accounted for by natural laws. God made the lightning, in popular estimation, till Franklin flew his kite and brought it down from heaven to the realm of nature. —Robert C. Adams.

CREDITING him with only ordinary talents and a school board education, Jehovah should hav produced a better book. There must be some reason, very real, but not very apparent, for his maundering imbecilities and slip shod blunders. After earnest but not prayerful study, I think I hav discovered the reason of El Shaddai's literary aberrations. No man, and presumably no god, can produce a book that deserves to be read and to liv unless he be free from carking cares, the fight for bread and the mean little battle for boots. True, semi-immortal works hav been produced by those with thread-bare garments and empty larders; but only when they hav been dowered with the rare gift of complete self-absorption, and hav been able to revel with kingly wealth in the dignity of their subject, utterly oblivious of common cares and domestic infelicities. Now, Jehovah-jireth may possibly not be gifted with the sublime self-absorption necessary to Bible-writing on severe and elevated lines. His domestic complications are, to put it mildly, strange. He had a son without having a wife, and this sort of thing alone entails, as a rule, an amount of worry and moral unrest This worry and unrest is not likely to be minimized by the fact that the son of the author of the Bible is of the same age as himself, nor by the fact that this son had only a Ghost (a "Holy" one, however) for a mother, she being of the same age as the father and the son. And we can readily surmise that domestic acrimony in heaven became more acrimonious still when the son, apparently dissatisfied with having a mere Ghost for a mother, selected a human mother for himself and actually condescended to get born in a stable. Talk of an earl's daughter running away with her father's groom!—what is that to Jehovah's son being born in a stable among asses and with a she-barber for a mother?* Under domestic humiliation like this, I question whether Milton himself could hav written much better than Jehovah has done.—Saladin in God and His Book.

FELLOW-SCHEMERS.—THE ONLY TWO PARTIES INTERESTED IN KEEPING THE WORLD'S FAIR CLOSED ON SUNDAY.

Notes and Clippings.

"Hav you anything new?" asked a customer of a recently engaged clerk in a Chicago store. "I'll see," replied the young man, as he swept his eye over the shelvs. "Yes, here's 'The New Testament.' Would you like to look at it?"

"Merry-go-rounds and their Evil Influence on the Community" was the subject of the discourse of the Rev J. G. Ditmars the other night in Williamsburgh, N. Y. The church is in the vicinity of one of the best patronized carrousels in Brooklyn.

There hav been many stories of the origin of the word and practice of baptism, but I doubt whether this ingenious explanation of its derivation by an old darky preacher, which will be appropriate to giv here, has ever been printed. "It's des like dis," he says: "De fust thing to do is to splash the body into the water, and den dere's a sound bap; and den when de body rises and goes to de bank you hears de water a-dripping off like tism, tism, tism—and dere's the meaning of the word bap tism!"—Chicago News.

Mme. Boulanger was bigoted, and was one of those French Catholics who imagin that the altar must, to prosper, be flanked by the throne. General Boulanger first broke away from her at the Hotel du Louvre, because the crowds of Freethinking Radicals who attended his levees there were shocked to see nuns, monks, and priests all the time going to see her or coming from her parlor. She had a sad temper, the consequence of a bad liver, and set down to a higher morality than his and to religious feeling her gloomy disposition.

To this great sovereign lord, Science, all men may appeal without distinction of race, birth, or condition, and they may wander and investigate within its courts without money and without price. The mandates of Science are inexorable and drawn entirely from the wellspring of eternal truth. No opinion can alter its laws, no delusions change the current of its wisdom. It is the serene sovereign of peace, ruling in the empire of mind, and sooner or later, all the world and the universe will acknowledge its entire sway.—The Jury.

Chili is a great country for newspapers; there are more than forty of them in Valparaiso and Santiago, and there are others in all the head towns of departments. Chili has many literary men, including a regiment of poets, and also many scientific men and a multitude of statesmen and generals. The schools are free and the educational system provides for provincial lyceums, normal schools, an agricultural school, schools for the arts and trades, military and naval academies, and a national university, all supported by the government. In some years there hav been one thousand students at the Santiago university.

"The fact that Petrarch was an ecclesiastic nowise added to his faults in the eyes of his contemporaries," says the Sun reviewer. "The celibacy of the priesthood was known to be a mere empty phrase. From the popes and cardinals down there were very few in the ranks of the clergy who could cast a stone at Petrarch on the score of sexual derelictions. The general immorality of the church in his day is manifest from the circumstance that when Petrarch's enemies sought for slanders with which to blacken his name, not one of them thought of mentioning his illegitimate children as a disgrace to him or to his profession, although their existence was well known and acknowledged."

Under a regime of extravagant fanaticism, such as exists in Russia at present, no one outside the strictest pale of orthodoxy is safe. Any chance word, a criticism of a drunken priest, may condemn its utterer to hopeless exile. For under such a law as exists, what may not be construed as criminal? Article 178 says that whoever publicly uses words with the object of casting obloquy upon the orthodox faith, or scoffs at the holy scriptures or the holy sacraments, is punishable with the forfeiture of all civil rights and penal servitude for a period of from six to eight years. If this crime be not committed in a public place, but, nevertheless, with the object of impairing the faith of those present, or of leading them into error, the guilty person is sentenced to loss of all civil rights and banishment to a remote district of Siberia.

A special correspondent of the Voice writes to his paper: "The Philadelphia Evening Telegram and other papers hav printed specials from Washington relativ to members of the ecumenical Methodist council, who preached temperance in this city last week and then stood up before bars and sipped mixed drinks or quaffed the foaming lager. This charge was laid mainly at the door of foreign delegates, and the charge is only too true. Many of them drank at the bars of the hotels where they were stopping, while others sought retired places where the sign, 'Ladies' entrance,' adorned the side doors. Some of the English brethren did not appear to care who saw them drink, and went about it in a matter-of-fact way. The 'New York Buffet,' on 10th street, was a favorit resort for a few of them. More than one applied at police headquarters to be directed to a quiet place where they could hav lunch and refreshments."

A French barrister, M. Desmarets, lately wrote to Signor Crispi pressing him to take the initiativ in organizing the United States of Europe. This was Crispi's reply: "The league of the three monarchies, Italy, Germany, and Austria Hungary, has been formed to guarantee the peace of the continent and without any desire of conquest. It is henceforth the kernel of the European confederation. If France chose, she might join the three powers, who would receive her into their company with enthusiasm. Her example would doubtless be followed by the other nations, and we should hav at once and without difficulty the United States of Europe. General disarmament, the lightening of taxation, and the welfare of the taxpayers would naturally follow. In this great European union, removing all reason for the preponderance of one state over another, the question of nationalities would be quickly and amicably solved by the confederates. It would be a matter of internal organization and nothing more."

How Putnam Shakes Up Orthodox Belief.

From the Stockton, Cal., Independent

Samuel P. Putnam had a large audience in Turn-Verein hall last night. He spoke on "The Bible and Modern Thought." He said:

"You cannot think God. God is the unknowable. God is an object of faith and is found through the human heart. I do not dispute with any man about his belief. You can settle a question of knowledge, but not of belief. I deny that God is an object of human knowledge. Belief and knowledge are different states of the mind. The theologian's argument for God's existence is the design of the universe—the universe was made and therefore there must be a God. Design is merely adaptation, order, and harmony. If the argument of design is good when applied to the universe it is equally good when applied to God himself and we hav an endless number of Gods and creations. The theologians escape this conclusion by saying that God is infinit. The same argument applies to the universe then, for it is infinit. We don't need any God at all to explain the universe. It does not explain anything to say that God made it. Theology is no more an explanation of creation than the old mythology was. Theologians first said that the earth was flat; that it was supported on the back of an elephant, which was supported on the back of a turtle, which in turn was supported on the broad back of Atlas. Who supported Atlas was unknown until a bright newspaper man suggested that he must hav married a wife and that she supported him.

"All that the human mind can explain is not the beginning, but the process of things. Suppose the universe were the outcome of an infinit intelligence. Does that suppose God? God is infinit love as well as infinit wisdom. If those qualities are working together there can be only a perfectly beautiful universe. If there is evil in it there must be a limit to the love of the creator. That there is an evil everywhere experience shows. Science declares that the universe is an infinit battle-ground, life feeding on life. If we are in the path of nature's forces she destroys us as relentlessly as the stubble of the field.

"The philosophy of Freethought is that we neither affirm nor deny; we simply say that we do not know. A Freethinker can be an Atheist or a Deist. Some of the foremost Freethinkers, like Voltaire and Paine, believed in God. Paine wrote the "Age of Reason" because he did believe in God. Could Thomas Paine stand at the church doors today and proclaim his sentiments he would be welcomed inside. The difference between Paine and orthodoxy was not in reference to divine revelation, because he believed in that, but it was over the kind of revelation. He affirmed that the revelation of God was permanent and universal, that it was in all nature, in humanity itself, in man's thought and aspiration. Orthodoxy denies that and says that God's revelation was special and miraculous; that it was disclosed eighteen centuries ago, and that since then no light has come to humanity; that unless we believe in the special and miraculous revelation we will be forever condemned. It is a tremendous proposition that we must believe in the Bible to be saved. If so we ought to know it as certainly as that the sun shines in the heaven. Christian scholars of today grant that only twelve books of the Bible are genuin. Only one of David's psalms is admitted by them to be genuin. Nobody knows who wrote the book of Daniel. No Christian scholar asserts that Moses wrote the books of the Pentateuch as we hav them to-day. In those very books is an account of the death and burial of Moses. They speak of the kings of Israel, yet there were no such kings until five hundred years after Moses's death. Many of the places mentioned in those books were not in existence till five hundred years after the death of Moses.

"In the account of the temple of Solomon it is stated that the law of God was written on two tables of stone. Those two tables were the only records in existence then. There was no Bible at that time, yet that was one thousand years after the purported writing of the Bible. Not one single book in the Old Testament was written earlier than eight hundred years before the birth of Jesus. That is sufficiently well proved. Moses lived fifteen hundred years before Jesus. The history of the Jews during the intermediate seven hundred years was carried along by tradition, and unknown scribes then wrote the legends which had been preserved and attributed them to Moses. Christian scholars consider only four books of the New Testament as genuin. Luther and Calvin rejected the epistle to the Hebrews. Nobody knows who wrote it or the book of Revelation, or when or where the book of Revelation was written. The four gospels it is admitted were written from thirty-five to one hundred and twenty-five years after the death of Jesus. What kind of history is that which is written from oral tradition, from hearsay, thirty five years after an event? What would a history of the war be worth if no documentary evidence were preserved, if only the testimony of man's word of mouth were used thirty-five years after the close of the war? Stories are easily believed and accepted as facts. That tale of the surrender of Lee to Grant under an apple-tree was very pretty and was believed and is doubtless believed by many people to this day, yet Grant in his memoirs said there was nothing in the apple-tree story. When we were boys we believed the story of William Tell as implicitly as we did the story of Jesus, but in Switzerland in the last six months the teaching of the William Tell story has been forbidden in the schools, because every scholar knows it is a myth. The four gospels purport to be the testimony of eye-witnesses, yet they are a mass of contradictions, giving different accounts of the life, death, burial, and resurrection of Jesus. That shows that the gospels were a mass of traditions. I affirm that the first gospel could not hav been written until at least one hundred and twenty-five years after the death of Jesus. There is no reference to them in any other writing until at least one hundred and fifty years after the death of Jesus. I challenge any clergyman to giv any evidence of their existence before that time.

"Our Christian friends say that the Bible is the only revelation given by God to man. If so we ought to hav the same Bible from age to age. I deny that the Bible of to-day is eighteen centuries old. It is only a little over three hundred years old. It was formulated by the council of Trent, and the members of that council were not unanimous on what should be included in the Bible. The early Christian churches and Christian fathers differed as to their Bibles, including in them books which are excluded to-day, and excluding books which are now included. Why do Protestants accept this Catholic Bible from the council of Trent? Why not select the books of the Bible with the enlightenment of to-day, instead of going back to the ignorance and superstition of the dark ages? Martin Luther rejected the book of Esther, which he said was full of heinous naughtiness; the book of Hebrews, the epistle of St. James, epistle of St. Jude, and the book of Revelation, which he considered almost bad enough to throw in the river Elbe. Our orthodox friends say they must believe in the Bible or be forever lost. If God ever gave a book to humanity with signs and wonders and angels' voices we ought to hav the book God gave. If ever given, God's Bible has mingled with the dust of the earth for thousands of years. All we hav is man's copy, and not the first or the hundredth copy. The oldest copy of the Old Testament we hav was made in the sixth century. Scholars to arrive at a correct reading of the scriptures hav to consult fifteen or sixteen copies. In the oldest copy of the New Testament extant are included books which are declared heretical by the Christians of to-day, the epistle of Barnabas for instance.

"The Bible is crowded with mistakes. It was not divided into chapters and verses until four hundred years ago. The monks in the thousand years in which they made copies of the scriptures multiplied them, putting in changes to suit their own notions. The only text which speaks of the trinity is declared by Christian scholars of to-day to be a forgery, and it has been thrown out of the new version. The Lord's prayer in the Bible of to-day is not correctly given, and in the new version the closing sentences of the prayer as repeated in Christian churches and families are flung out. In the Bible there are two hundred and thirty thousand admitted mistakes.

"If the Bible is true, that does not make it divine, for man's natural faculty is truth, but if it is false it must be an imperfect and human production. If false in one particular its testimony is valueless in everything else according to law. It says that the world was made in six days. Nobody believes that story to-day. The evidence is overwhelming of the existence of man on this planet hundreds of thousands of years ago, instead of a few thousand years ago, as indicated by the Bible. There is not a board of education in the country that dares put this Bible story of the creation in the school-books. Christian theologians of to-day reject the literal biblical account of the creation, but how do they escape the dilemma? By saying that day did not mean twenty-four hours as used there, but an indefinit period of years. Hebrew scholars say that no such meaning can be given. What did the author mean by the word which signifies day? We find his meaning in Ex. xx, where it is said that six days shalt thou labor and on the seventh rest. The meaning cannot be anything else but a day of twenty-four hours. The commandment in Exodus is founded on the story in Genesis, which says that God made the world in six days and rested on the seventh. The terms are identical, and what the word means in Exodus it means in Genesis. If we take the modern construction of the word as given in Genesis we would hav the people in Exodus directed to work six periods of a million years, for the word and the meaning in Genesis is the same as in Exodus.

"The order of creation according to the Bible is that the water population was created first, the air population next, and the land population last. Science has proved that the order was water, land, and air population. As Huxley says, the order of science is absolutely irreconcilable with that of the Bible. It is as if a man would say that the order of states on this coast is California, Washington, and Oregon. You would call him a colossal liar. That is the same sort of lie as in Genesis.

"The Bible is part of man's history. We find good things in it just as we find gold and silver in the mountains, flinging the dross aside. Our Christian friends insist that the dirt is just as good as the gold and silver and equally valuable for human happiness. Does anyone believe the story of Jonah and the whale to-day? Some clergymen do. Sam Jones says that he does, and that if the Bible put the story the other way and said that Jonah swallowed the whale and kept it down for three days and three nights he would believe it. Take the Bible through common sense. My Christian friends cannot giv up the Bible because they say it is such a consolation to them in the hope of immortality that it givs. The hope of immortality is in other religions also. It never came from any book or any priesthood. That hope sprang from the human heart, from human love. The Bible simply expresses that hope. In all the Old Testament there is no doctrin of immortality at all. It teaches that man dieth like the beast of the field and goes to the dust thereof. The devil is the only one in that Testament who suggests immortality. Jesus is the first one in all the scriptures to speak of immortality, but the heaven of the New Testament is a little place of joy amid misery and suffering. I don't want that orthodox heaven. I would rather roll forever on seas of fire than turn from heaven to behold my loved ones in agony and thank God for sending them to hell. I don't want a soul like that. Mine is the salvation of all mankind.

"The Bible has not advanced civilization. Where the civilization of the Bible prevails they plow with the same crooked stick that was used eighteen hundred years ago. The Bible is accepted by civilization like anything else; it simply accompanies civilization like the stovepipe hat. Wherever there is civilization you will find the stovepipe hat; therefore the stovepipe hat is the cause of civilization. That is the way Christians argue about the Bible. The Bible sanctions war, slavery, polygamy, intemperance, theft, and other crimes.

"The Sermon on the Mount is not good enough for the world to-day. Christians cannot liv up to it. Take no thought of to-morrow, it says. Such a doctrin makes a man a tramp. It is forethought and building for the future that produces farms, orchards, and progress. Love your enemies, it says. You cannot do it Do you suppose there is any Christian orthodox clergyman who loves me? The New Testament practically tells you not to love your father and mother and your friends. You must abandon them. The teaching of Confucius to 'Love your friends and your enemies treat justly' was better. I don't accept the teachings of Jesus as common sense. I am an anti-poverty man. There will be no real progress until poverty is destroyed. In all the 'Sermon on the Mount' there is not one suggestion as to how to destroy poverty. Jesus said, 'Blessed be the poor.' He considered poverty a good thing."

Rev. Mr. Cuddy, a traveling minister, interrupted, saying: "Why do you not quote all?"

Mr. Putnam said that Mr. Cuddy evidently was not thoroughly familiar with the Bible, as he had quoted the sentence.

Rev. Mr. Cuddy then read from Matthew, "Blessed be the poor in spirit."

Mr. Putnam said that his text was in Luke vi, 18, "Blessed be ye poor." The audience was evidently in hearty sympathy with the lecturer, for it applauded his reply and some satirical comments and everything that he said thereafter. He added:

"I don't accept 'Blessed are the poor in spirit' as an improvement. I don't believe in being poor in spirit. The more spirit the better. I don't believe in this mock Christian humility. If a man smites me on one cheek I won't turn the other, but I'll giv him something else. If he takes my coat I won't giv him my cloak, but I'll send a police officer after him. Christian clergymen preach the doctrin of poverty, but they do not believe in it. If a minister is offered $2 000 to go somewhere else and is getting only $1 000, the extra $1 000 will be chockful of the voice of the Holy Ghost telling him to make the change. 'The poor ye hav always with you.' I don't accept or believe that. My faith is in humanity. The world is better to-day than it was one thousand years ago, and human genius and human endeavor will sweep poverty from the pathway of humanity. How does Christianity deal with poverty? By giving alms. What the poor man wants is not charity, but justice. When justice is enthroned there will be no need of alms; every man will hav employment and a home. Christianity teaches the poor man to starve on this side of the Jordan so that on the other he may hav a coach and six and play on a harp with Gould and Vanderbilt. The New Testament teaches that poverty is in itself a virtue and wealth a crime. In the parable of Lazarus and Dives you don't read anything bad about Dives, yet he goes to hell to suffer forever and ever because he is rich, while Lazarus goes right to Abraham's capacious bosom. We do not read that Lazarus had a single virtue. He was nothing more than a tramp. Why did he go to heaven? Simply because he was dead broke. I don't want that kind of heaven. I believe in a heaven won by human endeavor and human genius. I believe in human kindness."

The lectures were under the auspices of the Stockton Liberal League, of which C. F. Fresman is president and Victor Heck secretary.

Some Economic Opinions.

Colonel Ingersoll in the Chicago Tribune.

"The farmer that raises corn and sells it as corn is not so apt to get what they call fore-handed as one who sells his corn not as corn but as pork and beef and horses. The latter makes all the profit that is made out of the corn business. When we take into consideration the difference between the raw material and the manufactured thing we see why this doctrin is true. The raw material of the locomotiv is not worth to exceed $5 or let us say $10, and I mean by 'raw material' the ore in the ground and the coal in the ground and the limestone used in the furnace. Now, the difference between the $10 and the $10,000 for which the locomotiv sells is made by labor, by ingenuity, by the development of the brain. So it seems to me that in every point of view protection is good. But they say: 'We can get steel rails cheaper in England than we can get them here.' Well, let us see. Suppose we pay $30 for a ton of steel rails made in the United States. Then we open the books and the account is: 'The United States, credit by one ton of steel rails, $30. The United States, credit by cash for one ton of steel rails, $30.' That is to say, at the end of the transaction there is a ton of rails and $30 all in the United States.

HOW IT FIGURES THE OTHER WAY.

"Now, let us suppose that we could hav obtained the ton of rails from England for $25. Then how does it stand: 'The United States, credit, one ton of rails, $25. Great Britain, credit, $25 for one ton of rails.' So that at the end of the operation England has $25 and we hav got a ton of rails; but with the other operation we hav got a ton of rails and $30. It is all here. So I am for an American system, an American policy. And I am not so sure but what I would go much further than the protectionists hav gone. I am not so sure but what the true theory would be to let into this country free anything we cannot make, anything that we cannot produce, and anything we can make and anything we can produce, not to let it in at all. Of course, in this country there is a great diversity of interest. The men who import hav an idea that they want free trade. In that, however, they are mistaken. Let us hav free trade and their services for the most part would be dispensed with. Another thing: their customers would become so impoverished that their business would amount to but little. So I am a protectionist."

"How do you stand on the money question?"

"I am with the Republican party on the question of money. I regard money as a commodity, something that cannot be created by law any more than you can create wheat or corn by law. I am also for the use of gold and silver both, but I want a dollar's worth of silver in a silver dollar. I do not believe in light money, or in cheap money, or in poor money. These are all contradictions in terms. Congress cannot fix the value of money. The most it can do is to fix its debt paying power. It is beyond the power of any congress to fix the purchasing value of what it may be pleased to call 'money.' Nobody knows, so far as I know, why people want gold. I do not know why people want silver. I do not know how gold came to be money; neither do I understand the universal desire, but it exists, and we take things as we find them. Gold and silver make up, you may say, the money of the world, and I believe in using the two metals. I am a believer in silver because the United States is the greatest silver producing country; and the value of a thing, other things being equal, is in accordance with the number of its uses; and if silver is used as money it adds to its value. I do not believe in depreciating any American product; but as value cannot be absolutely fixed by law, so far as the purchasing power is concerned, and as the values of gold and silver vary, neither being stable any more than the value of wheat or corn is stable, I believe that legislation should keep pace within a reasonable distance at least of the varying values, and that the money should be kept as nearly equal as possible.

ONE TROUBLE WITH MONEY TO DAY.

"Of course there is one trouble with money to-day, and that is the use of the word 'dollar.' It has lost its meaning. So many governments hav adulterated their own coin and so many hav changed weights that the word 'dollar' has not to-day an absolute definit, specific meaning. Like individuals, nations hav been dishonest. The only time the papal power had the right to coin money—I believe it was under Pius IX., when Antonelli was his minister—the coin of the papacy was so debased that even orthodox Catholics refused to take it, and it had to be called in and minted by the French empire before even the Italians recognized it as money. My own opinion is that either the dollar must be absolutely defined—it must be the world over so many grains of pure gold or so many grains of pure silver—or we must hav other denominations for our money, as for instance, ounces, or parts of ounces; and the time will come, in my judgment, when there will be a money of the world, the same everywhere; because each coin will contain upon its face the certificate of a government that it contains such a weight—so many grains or so many ounces—of a certain metal. I for one want the money of the United States to be as good as that of any other country. I want its gold and silver exactly what they purport to be; and I want the paper issued by this government to be the same as gold. I want its credit so perfectly established that it will be taken in every part of the habitable globe. I am with the Republican party on the question of money; also on the question of protection; and all I hope is that the people of this country will hav sense enough to defend their own interests."

"Hav you a word to say about the World's Fair?"

"I believe it will be not only worthy of Chicago but of the United States. It will be in all probability the greatest fair that has ever been held, and I believe it will do an immensity of good in countless ways and New York will be on exhibition with the rest."

The Three Ages.

Mark Twain's Letters to the Sun.

As a result nothing is left [at Aix les-Bains] of the handiwork of the remoter inhabitants of the region except the constructions of the lake-dwellers and some Roman odds and ends. There is part of a small Roman temple, there is part of a Roman bath, there is a graceful and battered Roman arch. It stands on a turfy level over the way from the present great bath-house, is surrounded by magnolia trees, and is both a picturesque and suggestiv object. It has stood there some sixteen hundred years. Its nearest neighbor, not twenty steps away, is a Catholic church. They are symbols of the two chief eras in the history of Aix. Yes, and of the European world. I judge that the venerable arch is held in reverent esteem by everybody, and that this esteem is its sufficient protection from insult, for it is the only public structure I hav yet seen in France which lacks the sign, "It is forbidden to post bills here." Its neighbor, the church, has that sign on more than one of its sides, and other signs, too, forbidding certain other sorts of desecration.

The arch's next nearest neighbor—just at its elbow, like the church—is the telegraph office. So there you hav the three great eras bunched together—the era of War, the era of Theology, the era of Business. You pass under the arch, and the buried Cæsars seem to rise from the dust of the centuries and flit before you; you pass by that old battered church, and are in touch with the Middle Ages, and with another step you can put down ten francs and shake hands with Oshkosh under the Atlantic.

It is curious to think what changes the last of the three symbols stand for; changes in men's ways and thoughts, changes in material civilization, changes in the deity—or in men's conception of the deity, if that is an exacter way of putting it. The second of the symbols arrived in the earth at a time when the deity's possessions consisted of a small sky freckled with mustard-seed stars, and under it a patch of landed estate not so big as the holdings of the czar to-day, and all his time was taken up in trying to keep a handful of Jews in some sort of order—exactly the same number of them that the czar has lately been dealing with in a more abrupt and far less loving and long-suffering way. At a later time—a time within all old men's memories—the deity was otherwise engaged. He was dreaming his eternities away on his great white throne, steeped in the soft bliss of hymns of praise wafted aloft without ceasing from choirs of ransomed souls, Presbyterians and the rest. This was a deity proper enough to the size and condition of things, no doubt a provincial deity with provincial tastes. The change since has been inconceivably vast. His empire has been unimaginably enlarged. To-day he is master of a universe made up of myriads upon myriads of gigantic suns, and among them, lost in that limitless sea of light, floats this atom. His earth, which once seemed so good and satisfactory and cost so many days of patient labor to build, is a mere cork adrift in the waters of a shoreless Atlantic. This is the business era, and no doubt he is governing his huge empire now, not by dreaming the time away in the buzz of hymning choirs, with occasional explosions of arbitrary power disproportioned to the size of the annoyance, but by applying laws of a sort proper and necessary to the safe and successful management of a complex and prodigious establishment, and by seeing to it that the exact and constant operation of these laws is not interfered with for the accommodation of any individual or political or religious faction or nation.

Mighty has been the advance of the nations and the Liberalization of thought. A result of it is a changed deity, a deity of a dignity and sublimity proportioned to the majesty of his office and the magnitude of his empire, a deity who has been freed from a hundred fretting chains and will in time be freed from the rest by the several ecclesiastical bodies who hav these matters in charge. It was, without doubt, a mistake and a step backward when the Presbyterian synods of America lately decided, by vote, to leave him still embarrassed with the dogma of infant damnation. Situated as we are, we cannot at present know with how much of anxiety he watched the balloting, nor with how much of grieved disappointment he observed the result.

What Is Inside of the Earth?

From Goldthwaite's Geographical Magazine.

Many scientific men are devoting their lives to finding out all that can be learned about the interior of this wonderful globe of ours. One of the interesting problems on which they are engaged is the depth and geological limits of the permanently frozen soil. The British Association has collected a large amount of data on this question. It has already told us some curious things, such as the fact that excellent wheat lands north of Manitoba overlie frozen earth that never thaws.

Some geologists find strata of rock that they are able to show must hav been buried at a remote age 10 000 feet under the surface. These upturned edges of rock, which some terrible convulsion lifted to the air, give us a glimpse of the condition of the interior some way below the greatest depth to which we can attain. The workmen in the deepest mines in Europe swelter in almost intolerable heat, and yet they hav never penetrated over one seven-thousandth part of the distance from the surface to the center of the earth. In the lower levels of some of the Comstock mines the men fought scalding water, and could labor only three or four hours at a time, until the Sutro tunnel pierced the mines and drew off some of the terrible heat, which had been 120 degrees.

The deepest boring ever made—that at Sperenberg near Berlin—penetrates only 4 172 feet, about 1 000 feet deeper than the famous artesian well at St. Louis. The result of this imperfect knowledge is that there are more theories and disputes among scientific men with regard to the interior of the earth than about any other problem of physical science. Some eminent physicists, for instance, like Sir William Thompson, hav believed that the crust of the earth is at least 100 miles thick. The majority adduce good reasons for believing that the crust is only 25 to 50 miles thick. All agree that the temperature within the earth continues to increase as it does near the surface—at the rate of 1 degree, Fahrenheit, for about every 55 feet of descent. All igneous rocks must be fused at no great depth.

In fact, at this rate of increase the temperature at 200 miles is 28 000 degrees Fahrenheit, which is Professor Rosetti's estimate of the probable temperature of the sun. It is improbable, however, that this rate of increase is maintained for a great distance, and many physicists believe that at some unknown but not very great depth the increase in temperature ceases. One of the most wonderful things in the study of science is the fact that the mysteries of one science are sometimes completely or partly explained by knowledge gleaned in some other department of study. It is thus that the naturalists who hav investigated the fauna and flora of scores of Pacific islands hav learned how far south Asiatic types prevail, and hav added great weight to the conclusions of geologists that these islands were once a part of the big continent north of them.

How to Help The Truth Seeker.

1. When renewing get a friend to subscribe and thus save a half dollar apiece.

2. Get your newsdealer to display it on his stand or in his shop window. Be sure that he displays the pictures.

3. Get your newsdealer to keep in stock one or more copies, with your guarantee to take off his hands at the end of the week any that remain unsold. If he exhibits them the pictures alone will sell them.

4. Take a few extra copies and circulate them among your acquaintances. On your request, we will send you back-number sample copies free.

5. Leave a copy occasionally where it will be picked up—in the train, in the factory, in the meeting-room, in the cigar store, in the barber-shop. Leave it picture-side up.

6. Keep in your pocket some of our cheap tracts and when convenient hand one to a friend.

News and Notes.

Over the vast rolling hills, amidst clouds of dust glittering in the evening sun—mounted on the front seat of the stage, which tosses like a billow to the swinging trot of the horses, I arrive at Angel's Camp, remote enough to be the dwelling of celestial beings, but full to the brim of human life—a mining town, where all sorts of people do congregate, and a picturesque panorama is unfolded. On this especial occasion a metropolitan aspect possessed the camp—a kind of Bowery air—for a dog-show "took the ranche" and filled the town to overflowing. The dogs were numerous, and the retinue that accompanied them was motley. There were monkeys mounted on tiny ponies, and they held their seat with amiable dignity. The band—a troop of negro minstrels—spread out in gay attire and made music along the crowded thoroughfare. It was an exhilarating turn-out—the greatest show of the season—and of course under the circumstances no Freethought lecture could be given. Reserved seats, even for babies, were seventy-five cents each. At this jubilant combination of dogs and minstrels the house was packed. I reckon the outside show, however, was as good as the inside, and I saved my pennies and watched the procession in the open air It occupied the town for one night and then disappeared. After this there was an opportunity to speak. I lectured on Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, October 27th and 28th. You always find plenty of intelligence in a mining camp. The deeper one digs in the earth the less superstition he has, I believe. There are no ghosts and no Gods in the lower regions, and they hav not yet reached hell-fire. About a year ago I was at Angel's Camp, and then plunged down into the vast abysses from whence the gold is taken. The mines here seem to be almost endless. In the Utica mine about six hundred thousand tons of ore are in sight. The shafts are over five hundred feet beneath the surface. The deeper down the more gold there is apparently. We might almost say that the mining industry of California is still in its infancy. With greater appliances and finer skill ten times more of the precious metal will be extracted than heretofore. I guess California will remain the wonder of the world with its vast variety of products, its gorgeous flowers and many-colored fruits, its tropical luxuriance, its snow-capped mountains, its magnificent valleys, its enormous trees and still unbroken forests, its gold, silver, and tin mines, and eight hundred miles of coast to greet the wealth of the Orient.

At the home of Mr. and Mrs. Chas. D. Lane there is always a cordial welcome for the Secular pilgrim. The fireside light glows here and the hospitable table is spread. Mr. Lane is superintendent of the Utica mine and has perhaps done more than anybody else to develop the resources of this country. All over this vast territory he has experienced the strange and varied fortunes of a pioneer. Angel's Camp is the place where Mark Twain used to locate, and his old "pard" still lingers among these hills. The scene of some of Bret Harte's sparkling poems is here. The early romance of California has not yet disappeared from these picturesque localities. Along the stage route I traversed are the solitary places where the "lonely highwayman" held up the coach, leisurely opened the treasure-box, and then vanished among the barren hills. A rocky pyramid with stunted growth of pine, a thousand feet high, towers along the roadside. This was the old-time rendezvous of Joaquin, the famous bandit. He was secure in his isolation, for he could watch the country in every direction for miles around. A wonderful epic might be woven out of the memories that still haunt this mountainous land.

Otto Dolling, of the Angel's Hotel, is on our list here. I lectured in his hall. Myron Reed, of the Mountain Echo, is an editor who has a mind of his own among these heaven-kissing hights. I hav to climb about five hundred feet to reach his sanctum. It is as lofty as the eagle's eyrie. The "mountain echo" is the voice of freedom.

Our old friend Robert Nagles was at the camp—a philosopher, an inventor, a pioneer of Utah, twenty-two years a miner there; over seventy years of age and still working away with cheerful spirit. I must thank Professor Woods, Otto Fetcher, and Vasco Matson for the beautiful music furnished at the last lecture. Professor Woods gave a violin solo, which was indeed exquisit and delightful. He is blind, but he plays the many-voiced violin with marvelous skill. It sings like a bird, ripples like a brook, trembles with human passion, and breathes the voice of wind and sea.

I was amused with the story of a Sunday-school scholar of this vicinity. His mother, a Liberal friend, told the story, and it has the smack of truth. His interpretation of the Bible is very much like the interpretations of the theologian—anything to make out your case. However, the boy was honest, while the theologian is not. The boy was taught the Golden Rule, with what impression the following declares. He had a quarrel with another boy, and knocked him down and licked him. His mother admonished him, said it was wrong. "Why," answered the youth with perfect sincerity, "they teach me the Golden Rule at Sunday-school, to do unto others as others do to you, and, by golly, I'm going to do it." This boy will make a first-class Bible commentator.

I say good-bye to Angel's Camp and the many friends here on Thursday morning. A blessed rain came the night before, and the roads are in fine condition, and the journey from early morn through sunrise among the hills to the bright and boundless day forward to the sparkling ocean was simply enchanting.

Boulder Creek, among the mighty forests, is my next point. I am a few hours in Santa Clara valley, the handsomest valley, I think, in the world, with its emblazonry of soft mountain walls, gardens, orchards, and vineyards making a rich tapestry upon the lovely plains, with the Lick Observatory shining afar, over which nightly the stars pass in wonderful procession. I am at the Willows. I hope to carry on the campaign at San José when I return from Southern California.

I always like to come to Boulder Creek, rain or shine. It is raining this time. I believe it always rains when I come to Boulder Creek. I wonder if the dynamite of Freethought makes it rain? I wonder if an Infidel lecture creates a disturbance in the atmosphere and brings down Pluvius Jupiter? At any rate, a rain-maker is a blessing in disguise and surpasses all the gods.

Boulder Creek has been burnt down since I was here, and is now being built up in handsome style. On this particular Saturday night that I gave my lecture there was a ball in honor of the new hotel, and I did not hav a very large attendance. However, I had a good attendance on Sunday afternoon and evening.

Although a new church has been built, the Liberals of Boulder Creek hold their own. The outlook is improving. I must thank the Secular Union choir for their excellent music. This is a delightful aid to our work, and the fact that we can hav so many singers to voice the hope and aspiration of our hearts is a notable sign of the world's advancement. Mrs. Mamie Brimblecom contributed a beautiful bouquet, which graced the table during the lectures. The pathway of Freethought begins to open into the land of song and flowers. The storm and tempest of conflict verges to peace and splendor. Boulder Creek, from the depth of its forest columns and its mountain gloom and glory, flings the forward signals of our noblest civilization.

M. S. Palmer, of Livermore, was with us and contributed one of his entertaining recitations. Miss Jessie Rodgers, on Sunday evening, gave, with fine effect, the poem recently published in THE TRUTH SEEKER—"Jehovah." The points were skillfully rendered, and the audience applauded to the utmost.

Again I enjoy the hospitality of W. S. Rodgers and family; Dr. Allen and wife and sister, all earnest Liberals; Charles Rodgers, who, in spite of sickness that would keep almost any man at home, attends the lectures; and Mrs. Walser and her children. Captain Brimblecom and family assist greatly in the work. O. R. Harmon is always ready to lend a hand. Mr. and Mrs. Michenor, and others, are among our troops of friends. So with sun and cloud, mists upon the mountain-top and rainbow splendors there, with the dark green woods, with voice of leaping waters, the campaign rolls along. Thence, with the whistle of the locomotiv, we take the memory of gleaming watch fires and generous comradeship.

And whom should I meet as I strike the valley below but the hermit of Ben Lomond, J. H. Curtis, on his way to San Francisco? He has just had a stroke of good luck and improves it with a two years' subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER, an order for about $20 worth of books, and $10 for the Secular pilgrim. That is cheerful. Long liv the hermit of Ben Lomond, the pioneer Freethinker, whose head is level and whose heart is in the right place.

Circling by the Golden Gates, sweeping along the glittering bay, trending into the vast San Joaquin valley, on Wednesday, November 4th, I reach Raymond, at the foothills of the Nevadas. The stages leave here for the Yosemite valley. There are immense quarries in the vicinity. The land is taken up principally for the wood, and large quantities are shipped. At present there is no travel to the mountains. Times are hard, they say. About a dozen houses are about Raymond besides the hotel and station. Sometimes this is a lively point, and fashion flutters in gay colors when the great stage-coaches are loaded and go thundering along the grade, the whip snapping in the air. To-day it is quiet. Scarcely a sound is heard, except when the train departs in the morning and returns at evening. Raymond is on a side-track, twenty miles from Berenda, which is on the main line. It is forty miles from here to the Yosemite valley.

I giv two lectures at Raymond. Not a great many are out at the first lecture. The hall is filled at the second lecture, not simply on account of the lecture, but because after the lecture there is a sociable and dance. This is a very good arrangement in some places. People will come to the dance and take in the lecture, and maybe they will get something out of the lecture to think of. Liberal lecturing is something like making hare soup. You must first catch your hare. So the lecturer must first catch his audience. It won't do to talk to empty walls. We hav no "Holy Ghost" with us. We must depend on men and women—real folks, not spirits of the air. The dance is a good thing, and I hope that the lecture is equally so. Anything to make the world move, head or heels.

Mayor Poole presides and the lecture and the dance are sandwiched with a desultory declamation by a nondescript individual by the name of Taylor. The main point he made was that there was a hell about the earth twenty miles thick, and that the Infidels had better be on the lookout or they would catch it. The elements would melt with fervent heat. He would hav talked all night long without saying anything, but the music of the violin interrupted his pathetic exhortation. He was greeted with roars of applause. There was no need of a reply to his overwhelming statements.

D Buckingham is our sturdy right-hand man at Raymond. As long as he is here our flag will fly in this remote corner of the world. I like to come here. It is a kind of delicious solitude—a hermitage for the time being. The vast mountains stretch away, a blue Italian sky is above, a soft and sunny atmosphere surrounds. It is a place for dreams—an escape from the tremendous conflicts of life. Nature is here in wild, sweet, and majestic scenes. The bed-rock of humanity is here—no fashion, no pretense, no humbug, but an intense reality—a mingling of civilization with savagery that is refreshing. We are at least free from the polished barbarism and damnable iteration of "respectable" society. There are "straight goods" here, be it man or beast, mountain or sky. The universe is frankly presented. There is no theatric performance. I like it. It is a breath of eternity on this "bank and shoal of time."

I am sorry to announce to my friends that the Freethought office in San Francisco must be permanently closed. The debts are more than we can pay. The burden greater than I can bear. I must confess that this is a most bitter disappointment. I hav hoped against hope. All my heart was in this paper. I hav devoted my energies to it for the last four years. It was the ambition and the joy of life. It was like a wound almost to death to surrender this splendid enterprise. There are times when we must giv up and let disaster trample upon us at will. But we recover, take breath, and resume the endless conflict of human life. That conflict will never cease. We are born to it, and must endure it, and we are cowards if we ever think to quit the battle.

I do not regret the enterprise. Good has been accomplished all along the line. He is a poor soldier who gives up for one or a dozen defeats. I don't propose to giv up. It is simply a question of life and death. Life is worthless unless it is devoted to an idea, a cause. A million disasters won't make that cause any the less noble, any the less beautiful.

I say to my friends, rally, rally to the support of THE TRUTH SEEKER, the Investigator, the Secular Thought, and other papers that still keep our flag flying. With more earnestness, with more determination, with more pertinacity than ever before let us enter into the mighty combat that has been raging for centuries and rages to day with the same supreme interests at stake. Freethought has gone down, but let its life-blood flow on in other channels. We are human and mortal, and sometimes we are too weak for the forces that are arrayed against us; but one thing is sure, weak and human and mortal as we are, we can still keep on trying; we can fight to the bitter end; we can be true to each other; we can help and hope in the darkest hour. I expect to die in the harness, and I look forward yet to many a victory for our cause, for Freethought the world over.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Raymond, Cal, Nov. 6 1891.

We hope that whenever a Freethinker sees an article in his local paper in favor of opening the World's Fair on Sundays he will mark it and send a copy to Benjamin Butterworth, secretary Board of Directors of World's Fair, Rand. McNally building, Chicago, Ill, and to John T. Dickinson, secretary National Commission of World's Fair, at the same address. Let us make a vigorous and persistent fight in this matter. Our efforts must not slacken till the final decision is made, which may not be till 1893.

WE will furnish free sample pages—pictures and text—of the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book" to any friend who will distribute them where they will do good, and to anyone who will become a selling agent a liberal discount will be made. A Freethinker of good address, man or woman, out of work, could make good salary selling this book in any town of fairly Liberal inhabitants.

Death of Dr. J. R. Monroe.

From the Ironclad Age.

Dr. Monroe was a nativ of Monmouth county, New Jersey. His father was a nativ of Burlington county, west Jersey. He was an educated man and an extensiv historical and general reader. His father and the grandfather of the subject of this sketch served as a soldier of the Revolution, having been a soldier in the British service before the breaking out of the Revolutionary war. He was first enlisted in Maryland and by successiv enlistments served during the war or until the storming of Stony Point, where he received saber wounds, breaking and mangling the shoulder, that disabled him during the remainder of his life. He was much in the immediate command of General Washington, who employed him in drilling new recruits. He died in Burlington at an advanced age, being entitled to large grants of land, which, however, by the destruction of papers by fire, and the failure to properly prosecute, were never recovered by his heirs.

Dr. Monroe was taught to read by his mother and while yet a child he read the Bible through and aloud at her knee, believing every word of it then, as he says, though we are sorry to say he rejected its divine origin since, and seemed to regard it as a blundering and contradictory history of doubtful authenticity, or a "cunningly devised fable." In this the writer sees nothing to commend except the doctor's boldness and candor and evident sincerity, which the writer freely concedes. While yet a mere child he was passionately fond of historical and poetical books, which passion was encouraged by his parents.

In October, 1838, his father came West with his family and brought up at Louisville. The following spring he came to this county, where he died near Vallonia, in the winter of 1839. His mother also died a few years later in Louisville.

In the fall of 1840 our lad, with a brother (long since dead) and another boy of their acquaintance, "enlisted" on a flatboat at Louisville, and started on a "perilous voyage" over the "raging falls" for the far South. The voyage was most enjoyable, especially to the subject of this notice, as Mr. Folsbury (then of Aurora) the owner of the boat, had a splendid line of books, including Byron, Moore, and other poetical works, and the duties gave ample time for study. Folsbury was a splendid reader and declaimer, and from him our hero derived valuable lessons.

The boat and cargo (hay, flour, and other produce) were sold at Natchez, and on returning to Louisville in the winter "our young man" found employment for a while about the mills there. Getting a little ahead he purchased and ran a furniture car, and a hack for some time. Both were profitable in that city at that period. Before going down the river he had written "Will Cobbett's Vision, or the Devil and Tom Paine," one of his earliest literary efforts (which appeared in his volume published last summer), and several other poetic pieces, many of which appeared anonymously in the papers of that day.

But prior to this he had set about to acquire a medical education and was devouring the contents of whatever medical books he could buy or borrow. Leaving Louisville in 1845 he studied medicin with Dr. Stage and later with Dr. Wallace, of Clark county, this state; and one winter and spring while engaged in teaching school in Salem his valued friend, Dr. H. D. Henderson (then in copartnership with Dr. Reed) kindly gave him the run of their office and medical books, from which he derived great advantage.

In the spring of 1848 he purchased a small farm of forty acres, near Newry, in this county. He remained there in a country practice until April, 1850, when he removed to Rockford and at once stepped into a lucrativ practice for that day. From this on until the winter of 1855 he found time to write many stories and poems, and to furnish correspondence for our county paper, and those of New Albany and Madison. In 1850 and 1851 he published essays against the grand jury system which are pertinent and which if republished now would find twenty indorsers where they had scarcely one at that time. He was hot against the isms and follies of that day, and published much in a burlesque style which he no doubt became ashamed of. Several of his poems and stories attracted much attention at that time, as Dr. Monroe was a zealous Whig and his opposition to the Democratic party partook of the bitterness of gall and wormwood; and so in February, 1855 he started the Rockford Herald, with a view of finally squelching that party in this county, if not in the whole country. We are glad to report that he has thus far failed to suppress it, and later, though he does not yet concede that it was fit to liv, he seemed to think it about as respectable as the Republican party. He always had credit for sincerity and candor, and lived to gain the respect and personal friendship of the leaders and influential Democrats in this county (and many elsewhere) whom he had so often and so unmercifully scored and labored to defeat; and finally amongst the leading Democrats of Jackson county who had often winced under his excoriations, he numbered many of his warmest friends, the writer of this himself falling in that category.

In July, 1857, the doctor removed his paper to Seymour and changed the name to the Seymour Times. In September of that year he removed with his family to Louisville, the better to pursue his medical studies, leaving his paper in charge of Samuel W. Holmes as editor, and Frank Williams as foreman. He graduated with distinction in the year of 1858, in the Kentucky School of Medicin, then under the control of such eminent men as Professors Goldsmith, Bullitt, Bayless, Hardin, Cummins, and others.

In 1861 the 50th regiment was recruited here, and Dr. Monroe in its early formation (Oct. 2, 1861) received from Governor Morton a commission as surgeon, it being the first commission issued to any officer in the regiment. He was mustered into the service of the United States by Capt. Charles E Norris of the regular army, on the 22d day of October, 1861. Captain Norris came here to muster in such recruits as had collected. The mustering (swearing in) was done about where Fifth street lies, a little west of the dwelling of Jesse Harris. Later in the winter of that year difficulties between Dr. Monroe and acting-Colonel Heffren, growing out of old political animosities, perhaps, culminated at Bardstown, Ky., and the doctor demanded a transfer to another regiment. A resignation was accepted by General Buell, and on the 11th day of March following he was re-commissioned as surgeon of the 49th regiment, and immediately joined it at Cumberland Ford.

The sickness among the soldiers of that command in the spring and early summer of 1862 was frightful. Dr. Monroe labored unceasingly and with scanty means for the relief of the brave and stricken boys, and was a great favorit with all. His own health finally broke down. He was attacked with partial paralysis, affecting mostly and rendering almost useless the left arm. It was that curious kind of spinal trouble that gives the victim an irresistible inclination to turn round in attempting locomotion. This affected the mind, and most of the month of July and a part of August of that year were almost a blank to the doctor. But in spite of his indisposition he continued his labors among the sick in camp until about the 1st of July. In this condition a resignation was reluctantly sent in, which received the following response from Colonel Ray, the gallant commander of the regiment:

HEADQUARTERS 4TH REGT. IND. VOLS.,
CUMBERLAND FORD, KY., May 30, 1862

DR. J. H. MONROE, Surgeon 49th Regt. Ind. Vols.—Dear Sir: Your letter of the 29th instant, tendering your resignation of the post of surgeon of the 49th Regt. Ind. Vols., was handed me yesterday.

In compliance with your request, I hav approved the same and forwarded to General Carter.

I extremely regret that your health should require such a course. With pleasure and readiness you hav faithfully discharged the arduous duties of your office, and given entire satisfaction in every particular, and were it not that your failing health is apparent to all, I would urge you to recall your letter. Under no other circumstances and for no other cause than you hav assigned, would the resignation be approved and forwarded.

You will bear with you the consciousness that you hav done your duty, and also the esteem and best wishes of the officers and men of this regiment, who hav carefully noticed and approved the efficient manner in which you hav discharged your duties to the afflicted members of the 49th.

I am, sir, truly your friend, J. W. RAY.
Colonel 49th Regt. Ind. Vols.

Early in July his indisposition increasing and his resignation not having been yet accepted, he was sent from Cumberland Gap to the hospital in Lexington, Ky., where he remained until his resignation was accepted, August 11th, shortly after which he returned home. The Times was conducted by other parties during the doctor's absence in the army. In its issue of August 21st appeared the following, which throws light on the nature of his ailment:

By the army surgeons Dr. Monroe's disease was pronounced to be located in the brain and nervous system. His left arm has been partially paralyzed for a long time, and the senses of hearing and taste hav been entirely destroyed on the left side. He has but partial control over the voluntary muscles of the left side of the body. The memory and mental faculties generally hav suffered and a distressing sensation of falling forward and to the right has been continually present. To this, almost total loss of appetite and night sweats hav been accompaniments since the middle of May.

Having measurably recovered, the doctor, among others, was sent by Governor Morton on special surgical duty to Murfreesboro on the occurrence of the battle of Stone River, where he labored amongst the wounded until the extra surgical force was no longer needed. He was also at Perryville on a similar service.

In the winter of 1863 the doctor had another and a worse paralytic attack, which confined him to the bed for many weeks. During this he sold the Seymour Times to Braxton Love and John R Jennings. But after several months, on recovering, he bought the paper back.

In March, 1869, having sold the Times and his farm near town, though not his town property, Dr. Monroe set out with six teams, intending to locate in Missouri, in stock-raising and farming. Reaching Paris, Ill., he became "mud-bound," and put his teams to farming there, intending to go on in the fall. But coming here on business, in compliance with a general desire he decided to return, and in July, 1859, he revived the Times and again resumed his practice.

Dr. Monroe built several good houses in Seymour. In 1873 he built the large and handsome residence he occupied at the time of his death on Chestnut street.

As a newspaper writer Dr. Monroe long held a high position. Very many good judges regarded him as one of the most effctiv political editors in Indiana, if not the very ablest.

He was bitter and terribly sarcastic upon whatever he opposed, and while he was the bitter and implacable partisan he always had the warm personal friendship of his political opponents, especially of those who knew him most intimately.

In the summer of 1875 the Doctor collected his dramas and poems and published them in a handsome volume.

Dr. Monroe was among the host of self-made men of our country. Without means and without friends he acquired a good education, and amidst poverty and hardship he acquired a knowledge of his profession, and we can say in truth, that as a physician and surgeon he had but few if any superiors in the state, and had he devoted his life and energies to his practice, unencumbered by any other pursuits, he would hav had a reputation enjoyed by few of his professional brethren. As it is, he stood at the head of his profession, and besides won an enviable position as a political writer, and his genius and powers as a dramatic and poetical writer were acknowledged and quite extensivly known.

It is the opinion of the writer that Dr. Monroe was one of the remarkable men of the times.

ALMOST all men are guided by the understandings of others, not by their own; and may be said more truly to adopt, than to beget, their opinions. Nurses, parents, pedagogs, and after them all, that universal pedagog Custom, fill the mind with notions which it has no share in framing; which it receives as passivly as it receives the impressions of outward objects; and which left to itself, it would never hav framed, perhaps, or would hav examined afterward. Thus prejudices are established by education, and habits by custom. We are taught to think what others think, not how to think for ourselvs; and while the memory is loaded, the understanding remains unexercised, in such trammels as constrain its motions and direct its pace, till that which was artificial becomes in some sort natural, and the mind can go no other. It may sound oddly, but it is true, in many cases, to say, that if men had learned less their way to knowledge would be shorter and easier. It is indeed shorter and easier to proceed from ignorance to knowledge, than from error. They who are in the last, must unlearn, before they can learn to any good purpose; and the first part of this double task is not, in many respects, the least difficult; for which reason it is seldom undertaken. —Lord Bolingbroke.

A Double-Meaning Poem.

[Sent by a Jersey City man to the Sun. Read the lines first as they are printed; then read them as they are numbered.]

1. The pomp of courts and pride of kings
3. I prize above all earthly things
5. I love my country, but my king
7. Above all men his praise I'll sing
9. The royal banners are displayed
11. And may success the standard aid
2. I fain would banish far from hence
4. The Rights of Man and Common Sense
6. Destruction to that odious name
8. The plague of Princes, Thomas Paine
10. Defeat and ruin seize the cause
12. Of France, her liberty, and her laws.

Specimen of Religious Reasoning.

The Dutch were thus satirized, some hundred years ago, by the Spaniards:

1. They rob God of his honor;
Because they tolerate all religions.
2 The king of his dues;
Because they revolted from the king of Spain, when he was about to set up an Inquisition among them.
3 The fish of their quarters;
Because they hav taken in part of the sea, in making their town, by strong banks, piles, etc., etc.
4 And burn up the earth before the day of judgment;
Because they burn much turf, peat, and clay for bricks, tiles, etc.

English Notes.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKERS: The opening of the new hall at Finsbury Park, a suburb of London, was a great success. Mr. G. W. Foote presided, whilst on the platform with him were Messrs. Touzeau Parris, Forder, Wheeler, Snell, Heaford, Stanley Jones, and George Standring; and in the audience were Mr. and Mrs. Samson, Messrs. R. O. Smith, Truelove, Fagan, and others who are interested in the local Freethought movement. Better still, the hall was crowded to excess by a most enthusiastic concourse of people. On Sunday I delivered the first lecture there and had a good audience. The weather was simply cruel. Among those present were Mr. and Mrs. Samson, Mr. J. M. Wheeler, and Mr. Brumage of the Portsmouth school board. As an experiment, a couple of recitations and some music were indulged in, with a shorter lecture than is usually given, and the result was all one could hav wished.

It is unfortunate for me that my first letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER should be the means of bringing my good friend and colleague, John M Robertson, about my ears. In his National Reformer, he invites me to withdraw an expression concerning the Bradlaugh memorial scheme. Well, I only wish I could; but as at present advised, I fear I must leave it just where it stands except that I do not for one moment suggest that John M. Robertson and some of his supporters are anything but excellent Secularists. His weak point is an excessiv love of peppery criticism (never mind of whom or of how small a point) and I fear that this very predisposition to opposition has run away with him in this matter which should hav provoked unanimity. Instead of "enemies" I might hav said "opponents."

The outdoor work is cooling down now for the winter, and indoor work shows up better. November's list of the London Secular Federation shows ten indoor stations at work. That is the largest I ever remember for London. In addition to the Sunday work, some of the ten are giving week-night lectures as well. Only three outdoor stations propose to wrestle with the fogs and frosts of chill November; and one can scarcely blame them. It is always hard work to talk for an hour in a London thoroughfare, even under the best conditions; but to inhale a soupy mist, with one's fingers too cold to turn over the pages of a book, and the audience trotting up and down to keep warm, is something as diabolical as most lecturers want to come in contact with. Of course there are always a few outsiders who are speaking as well as our own lecturers, and there are also Christians who are willing to take up the cudgels even in mid-winter; and so the work rolls on.

Peeping through my Wood Green audience I caught the face of a true veteran Freethinker who may often be seen there. Mr. Truelove is president of the Wood Green branch, and despite his long years and feeble health he does not think it beneath him or too much trouble to take part in our outdoor propaganda.

Mr. Truelove is a Freethought publisher, greatly honored by our English Secularists. In his early manhood he was an enthusiastic follower of Robert Owen, of whom he tells many anecdotes. For nine years he was secretary to the John Street Institution with which Thomas and Robert Cooper, Charles Bradlaugh, and George Jacob Holyoake were actively connected. During this period Truelove and his wife joined and removed to the community established by Robert Owen at Harmony Hall, Tytherly, Hampshire; and they remained there until the experiment was abandoned. The other details of his life would fill a biography, and so I must skip them. Suffice to enumerate two incidents. In February, 1858, Truelove was arrested, upon a warrant, for publishing a libel on Napoleon III. in a pamphlet called "Tyrannicide." He was put into a vile dungeon, and after his case had been delayed from April to July, the government abandoned the prosecution on the defendant declaring that he had no intention of inciting to assassination. The principle involved in the pamphlet was the right to discuss the question of tyrannicide. In 1877 Truelove was imprisoned for four months and fined £50 ($250) for publishing Robert Dale Owen's "Moral Physiology" and another work, "Individual, Family, and National Poverty." On his release he was feted at the London Hall of Science and presented with an illuminated address, and a purse, beautifully worked by Miss Bradlaugh, containing two hundred sovereigns. Mr. Truelove was eighty-two last October, and is still a more activ worker than many one-half his age. May he liv a long time yet.

A less known man in the party, but one to whom Secularists owe much, is Mr John Brumage, referred to above. Mr. Brumage is but sixty years of age, and has lived most of his time in English dockyards. As a Freethinker he always found opportunity for extending our sphere of labor by exciting interest in our doings. At Pembroke, Woolwich, and Portsmouth he was well known and highly respected, the latter town placing him sixth among fifteen successful candidates as their representativ upon the school board. Mr. Brumage is now living in London, and helping on the work at Finsbury Park.

Last Friday's meeting in support of the right of mailing Malthusian literature was a great success, and ought to open the eyes of the government to the fact that the British public cannot be jumped upon at pleasure. The British lion has a tail, and when it is trodden upon it sometimes discloses the unwelcome intelligence that the tail contains a sting. Dr. Drysdale is to be congratulated upon the quickness with which his Malthusians took up the inquisitorial gauntlet.

Theosophy is still engaging the attention of our bigwigs. For instance, Father Ignatius, the Anglican Benedictine monk, has discovered that the great Mahatma is none other than our old friend Jesus Christ. Mrs. Besant describes him as an Initiate. Maybe the Holy Ghost will settle the knotty point in due time. Anyhow, Mr. G. W. Foote has announced a course of three lectures on this fruitful subject, to be given at the London Hall of Science. You will probably like to hav the syllabus, so I append it:

(1) Madam Blavatsky, the first High Priestess of Theosophy; her Career and her Writings—Mrs. Besant, the second High Priestess—Mahatmas: Who, What, and Where?—Occultism, or Theosophic Juggling; with Parallels from History.

(2) Body and Spirit—Sevenfold Man—Mysterious Numbers — Pre-existence — Reincarnation — Alleged Proofs: Dreams, Hypnotism, Genius, Infant Prodigies—Oriental Jargon—Pantheism.

(3) Karma—The Path—Flesh and Spirit—Asceticism—Celibacy—Brotherhood—General Ethical Criticism of Theosophy—Its Pretensions and its Value.

Whatever Mr. Foote has to say is good, and he has wonderfully added to his reputation as a lecturer during the past six months. If he maintains the standard these lectures ought to be especially interesting and even valuable; for Mr. Foote has not only his own ability to trust to, but also the learning of his friend and colleague, J. M. Wheeler, than whom none of the Freethought party knows more about Oriental theology, unless it be J. M. Robertson. Yours fraternally, SAM STANDRING.

London, Oct. 29 1891.

Our London Letter.

Our Roman Catholic home secretary has had another outburst of virtue, and has instituted a prosecution against a Mr. Young for sending Malthusian pamphlets through the post. Of course, he easily found an obsequious magistrate ready and willing to carry out his instructions, and impose a heavy fine upon the culprit. As the punishment is probably illegal, the judge before whom the case will be next taken may reverse it, and it is evident the magistrate had some such apprehension, as he was extremely unwilling to state a case to a higher court, and would only do his duty in this respect on being threatened with a mandamus. The home secretary, who is as much detested by his colleagues as he is by the country generally, did not foresee what a hornets' nest he was stirring up, and no doubt by this time regrets his stupidity. He has never been bold enough to attack the Malthusian Society, but thought he was perfectly safe in attacking an individual. Unfortunately for him and his party, he never does make a move in any direction but what he blunders. The Malthusian Society and the Freethinkers who are in favor of its doctrins hav moved in this matter, and public subscriptions are invited and meeting with response, so that the necessary funds will be provided to fight out the matter before judges who hav some knowledge of law. It is certainly a disgrace to any country that so much money must be expended before a person can get anything approaching justice. Courts of first instance are generally presided over by magistrates who obtain the position solely by favoritism, and who are barristers who know nothing of law, and consequently failures in their profession. They simply carry out the behests of government officials and policemen, being incapable of examining the rights of a case.

The bishop of Dover, who is not likely to disparage his own party more than possible, is fain to admit that Sunday-schools are something very much akin to failure. He states that out of one thousand convicts in Pentonville prison 757 had at one time been Sunday-school scholars, their average time of attendance being three years. He had personally tried to trace one hundred children who had passed through his school. He was only able to trace seventy-seven, and of that number thirty-nine were confirmed drunkards, and only two were now church attendants. Such an admission must encourage parents to send their children for such tuition. I wonder what the Sunday-school Union will hav to say to such a charge. Possibly they will exercise a wise discretion in preserving silence.

A godly board-school teacher has just been fined for the third time for assaulting children under his charge, with a promis of imprisonment for the next offense. His excuse this time was that the pupil assaulted declined, in obedience to his father's wishes, to stay after school hours and listen to a scripture lesson. The benefits of scripture reading in public schools are very great as thus exemplified, and Secularists should now vote in a body for its continuance.

The Rev. Mr. Baxter, who from his oft-repeated false prophecies must hav some connection with those prophets into whom the Lord sent a lying spirit, has recently charged his secretary with embezzlement, but as the counsel for the defense stated he was willing to go fully into the question, which was really only a difference in accounts, the prosecutor at once withdrew the charge, and offered to pay the secretary's fare to Canada. It was a pity the case was not carried to the end, as some interesting disclosures might hav been made as to the way "Betholan" was financed, and what income the prophet made from it.

Salvation Booth, who has offered to pay £10 000 per annum for a site on the Thames embankment, and erect a building as headquarters of the value of £100 000, is not likely to get his offer accepted. The performances now going on at Eastbourne hav not recommended the Army to general favor, and as one of the members of the corporation of London said, Booth is not the sort of man to keep any agreement if he thought it would advance his purpose to break it. It certainly looks as if some of his former admirers are beginning to find out what Freethinkers hav said from the commencement of his career. The refuges that he has opened with such a flourish of trumpets to rescue the submerged tenth hav been shown to be complete frauds, and it remains to be seen whether his business has not already reached the zenith, and in a few years will be dead if not forgotten. In Re Abraham Lincoln and Spiritualism.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER Sir: Your correspondent, H. Wettstein, writing from Marengo, Ill., in his effort to stab Spiritualism, under the head "Lincoln Not a Spiritualist," starts wide of the truth when he declares that "Colonel Bundy concocted the latest scheme, with the notorious Miss Colburn Maynard, to draw the easily gulled into the Spiritualistic fold, said scheme being embodied in a book recently published by them relating how Lincoln became converted to their doctrins," etc. Reference is here made to a work just issued, "Was Abraham Lincoln a Spiritualist?" The truth is, Colonel Bundy was in no wise concerned in bringing out the work, had no interest in it as a business venture, and therefore "concocted" no scheme to gull the public. The work was projected by Mrs. Maynard, residing at White Plains, N. Y., and while it was in preparation and she was casting about how to publish it, being of limited means, the matter came to the knowledge of Mr. Rufus C. Hartranft, a reputable gentleman and publisher of Philadelphia. He was not a Spiritualist, and as such did not seek an interview with Mrs. Maynard. He believed the work would be a proper business enterprise to publish, and with an eye to business alone sought the authoress. He at once decided to undertake the publication, if the details should prove reliable, and forthwith began his investigations. After a thorough examination of the facts as related by Mrs. Maynard, and a consultation with numerous parties, he was satisfied the work was reliable, and took measures to bring it out, and has done so, John C. Bundy having no more to do with it than the man in the moon. These are the facts as to the publication of the work, so different from the statement of H. Wettstein that I think he was maliciously false or most wofully ignorant.

Again, he characterizes the authoress as the "notorious Miss Colburn Maynard," by this means apparently hoping to blacken the character of Mrs. Maynard and create a prejudice against her in the public mind. "Notorious," as used in this connection, is a sinuous, slimy epithet, evidence of a cowardly, dastardly spirit. How is Mrs. Maynard "notorious?" If she was what the user of the same would hav the reader imply, why did he not manfully and squarely giv us the facts which made her "notorious?" No; this he did not do, for he had nothing which could in the least compromise her character. I became acquainted with Mrs. Maynard before her marriage, some twenty-five or more years ago, and was then impressed by her personality. She was a lady in the best sense of the word, and I am sure that with the lapse of years she has lost none of the characteristics of a lady. I hav not seen her for some years, but I hav known of her through friends, some of whom saw her in Washington when giving sittings to President Lincoln. She has been an invalid fifteen years; for three years she has been confined to her bed through a rheumatic affection, suffering severe pains, excruciating in a high degree. And she is "notorious!" What shall be said of a man who will stab a woman like Mrs. Maynard, not openly and bravely, but sneakingly by insinuation? I might cite any amount of testimony from ladies and gentlemen of repute touching the character and reputation of Mrs. Maynard, but it will be unnecessary; besides, it unduly lengthens this article. I will, however, note what the family physician says. He stated that he knew Mrs. Maynard and had attended her about fifteen years; that she is now a hopeless invalid, has been confined to her bed nearly three years, and can not possibly recover; that during his experience and contact with her he has always found her to be an exemplary woman, but possessed of a peculiar organism and sensitivness of condition, and likewise of some peculiar power or magnetism, which, to say the least, was unexplainable, and that nothing within the science of medicin could clearly explain her psychic condition—or briefly in commonplace words, "We confess there is something about Mrs. Maynard that we do not understand; we, however, believe her to be a thorough Christian woman of irreproachable character and antecedents."

Appended to the letter of Mr. Wettstein is an article from the Chicago News, a letter from a Washington correspondent, attempting to impugn the verity of Mrs. Maynard's book, in an interview with Mr. J. G. Nicolay, private secretary to President Lincoln. There is nothing positiv in what the correspondent puts into the mouth of Mr. Nicolay. It is all I don't know, I don't believe things were so—testimony utterly negativ, which would be ruled out in court instanter. On the other hand, there are scores who know the truth of the facts detailed by Mrs. Maynard. Mr. Hartranft sifted the whole matter most thoroughly before becoming the publisher. He knew the book was absolutely true and governed himself accordingly. I might quote attestations by the score, but I will leave the matter in the hands of the public, as the book has been issued, and whoever wishes can examin that and learn all the facts.

WILLIAM FOSTER, JR.

The Battle of the Giants.

And there were giants in those days.

There once existed a race of intellectual giants, and much ado was there among them about a certain matter called copyright. The issue had to be decided by a melée open to all comers, ending with the approved maxim of "God show the right," and to the victor belong the spoils.

The lists presented a glorious sight. Six intellectual knights fighting in warlike array with waving plumes and glittering swords. The odds, however, appear unequal. Five are pitted against one. How can victory be his? But faith in a good cause and trust in his impenetrable armor of self-conceit, and the powers of the unconquerable club of selfishness, protect the lone champion. With desperate valor charge after charge is made on him, but deftly he evades being touched, and at every stroke of his ponderous mace a saddle is emptied or a weak spot in the opponent's armor penetrated. Four lie wounded unto death, and the fifth ignobly turns tail and flies from the lists, while the hero sends a barbed javelin after him called fickleness and archist.

And the great hero is just shaking hands with himself on the result of the auspicious occasion, when lo and behold, the runaway giant returns, decked out in a hauberk several sizes too small for him and a Spencerian plume stuck awry on his casque, brazenly trying to offer battle again by personating another fellow. But the lone giant hastily puts up a parallel column, grabs a Webster's dictionary and an encyclopedia lying loose in the lists, and smites him sore, very sore, with all the big words therein contained. And he said unto him, "Go home, thou sucker, and take a nap" And he hied him home, and has been napping ever since.

And the great intellectual giant shakes hands again with himself and muchly congratulates himself on his successful defense of human rights, in re copyright, by his single arm laying out five such giants, with no other help than Tak kak in the far rear.

And the great intellectual conqueror sate himself in his armchair, and he translated a book of unprecedented dulness, written by a theological numskull in an unpronounceable language, and he had this translation dubbed immoral and forbidden in the mails, and he sold it by express to suckers, and took a copyright on it, and groweth exceedingly sleek and fat and rich in filthy lucre.

Another champion appears in the arena. He is not fierce-looking and humbly challenges the lone giant on the ground that a true knight-errant's deeds should conform to his professed utterances. It is rather a tight squeeze for the victor, but as ever he rises equal to the occasion. Stooping down from his saddle, he picks up a rock labeled moralist, and hurls it with unprecedented force against the skull of the new-comer. And he tells him with a mighty frown that he wants no meddling in his private affairs, demanding a handsome apology on the ground that being an Egoist, such insinuations savor of insult and personality, which the rules of the lists forbid. And the moralist champion vacuates the lists, rubbing the spot where the boulder hit him, his physiognomy indicating that if not considering himself vanquished, yet he feels considerably bulldozed.

One more comes near to try his luck. He was arrayed in a rather haphazard kind of mitigated suit of mail, fabricated piecemeal out of several devices of plans for self-preservation, the whole offering a rather woebegone and weatherbeaten appearance. And the lone champion took up a sledgehammer called "unmitigated humbug," and laid him out before he had time to protest against the use of personalities or anything else.

And nobody else being around, the victor pumphandled the air and once more congratulated himself, "Egoism" being too far out west to do it in time.

Knights errant must eat, however, like other folks. This seemed to be particularly the case with the moralist champion we formerly mentioned. Nature had fitted him with a great capacity as a feeder, and blessed him moreover with a family that wanted supporting in a knightly manner. With his utmost efforts in the sham-battle line, it was impossible to prevent his exchequer from running low. Therefore he bethought himself of his former antagonist, the lonely champion of human liberty in re copyright, and resolved to become as sleek and well rounded a champion of the rights of men, regardless of consequences.

He therefore had him made a large silken banner, on which was embroidered in gilt letters the word "Expediency." And he hung it prominent above all the other banners that girdle the avenue leading to his castle's gate. And there were twenty-six of them, and they read somewhat as follows: A vacant land holder is a woman-starver and an orphan-robber. I demand the repeal of all laws for collecting debts. Free speech, free press, free trade, free land, free money, and, Anthony Smutbag consenting, free love also. There is no God! Government is a humbug!! etc. In all, twenty-six well counted.

And on the gate he had affixed a beautiful shingle, which read as follows:

See Moses Turn his coat.
Anarchist, Egotist, and Atheist!
Profession, lawyer.
Collections a specialty.
Tax-titles bought and sold for a reasonable profit.
Divorces procured without publicity.

And he diligently applied himself to the law and waxed exceedingly fat and sleek. And he betook himself to his former antagonist in re copyright and spoke to him thusly: "See, I was wrong and ignorant, and knew not the ways of the world. I wanted to reform. Now, I followed thy example and prospered fairly in the goods of this world, and laid hold of many chattels. I pray thee forgiv me my rashness in figuring as a moralist champion, and believe me I will henceforward travel the straight pathway of selfishness and take all the benefits that can be gathered there."

And the lone champion in re copyright playfully patted his back and grinningly said: "Well done, my son, I now dub thee Anarchistic knight-errant in earnest. As a true Egoist, be always true to thyself. In token of my implicit faith in thy capabilities, I will from now on intrust to thy care the legal defense of my copyright against all persons whomsoever, who might hav the unspeakable stupidity to infringe on my edition of the Schweitzer Tomato. Bless thyself, my son, and the world will bless thee."

And ever since peace has reigned among the Anarchistic defenders of human liberty, also harmony and brotherly love.

And they are growing more and more Chadbandly in demeanor and pot-bellied in stature, and they increased their submundane possessions exceedingly under the noble shadow of the broad banner of Expediency.

DE LESPINASSE.

The Effect of Opening the Art Museum on Sundays.

Before the Sunday opening of the Metropolitan Museum, says the Sun, the art gallery was the resort of hysterical enthusiasts. There were, of course, thousands of visitors who wandered about in a natural way, scores of artists and art-lovers with keen appreciation; but the visits of these were made weary by the men and women of the hysterical school, who were original only in their sensational adjectivs. This sort of thing still goes on, but of a Sunday a new kind of art critic is now admitted. He is always amusing, and at times instructiv. This critic is the people.

Some time ago a paragraph appeared in the Sun which set forth that in the streets of Tokio it was no uncommon sight to see a crowd of Japanese day-laborers at a window admiring a bit of exquisitly decorated pottery. It was not surprising when a museum employee said that the Chinese and Japanese were among the most persistent attendants at the museum, and that they seemed to hav considerable taste and to get a good deal of enjoyment. But the Chinese and Japanese do not come on Sundays. They prefer the week-days, when the crowds are not so large.

The Sunday crowd, if it can be judged from the people who went last Sunday, is a curious conglomerate of poor Americans and foreigners, with here and there people who show in dress and language that they hav had superior surroundings and education. The Sunday opening seems to be accomplishing just what it was designed for. It opens the museum to those who cannot come on other days, and who enjoy and can appreciate paintings, statuary, and antiquities. To some it seems impossible that a man or woman who has little of the learning of books should really care for art. Yet classical music will nowhere in this city get such applause as from Tompkins square's rough looking crowd.

Last Sunday about five thousand people, at least four thousand of whom showed in face and dress an intimate knowledge of the fierce struggles of life, visited the museum between 2 o'clock and 6 and seemed to enjoy themselvs about as genuinly as if they had several generations of culture back of them. They did not admire everything in the museum. They did not hav any tumultuous soul-heavings. They did not compare different schools. In fact, they did not do much talking of any kind. They looked until they got tired, then they sat down and rested, and in sitting down each chose a place where some picture that pleased him well could be seen. There was a uniformed gentleman who moved about in this crowd almost on tiptoe and with his nose in the air. One would hav thought he was picking his way through a sewer. The writer joined him to learn about this delicacy of step and nostril.

"A good crowd here to-day?"

"Plenty of 'em," said the uniformed gentleman; "but—beastly, simply beastly."

"What's the matter?"

"They think it's a dime museum. They look upon everything as freaks. You ought to see 'em down at the mummies. They take on like it was a circus."

"Where's the harm? They're enjoying themselvs."

The uniformed gentleman lifted his nose!

"This is a place where people come for art. These don't know nothin' about art."

Nobody paid any attention to him, however, and the queer and sometimes striking art criticisms went on as before. It was pretty bad down by the mummy cases for a sensitiv person, but funny at times for one of another sort. Early in the afternoon a party from Hester street or thereabout was near the entrance. They seemed to feel shabby, and put on an air of impudence to hide their feelings. There was a girl with hands in the pockets of her jacket and a general air of complacency. "Oh, Jim! come here once! Juss look at the body done up in cheese-cloth," and Jim and all the rest came. They looked in scornful amazement at such a poor showing for a corpse, and Jim said he guessed the body had been dead a good while. With this no one seemed to disagree. One of the girls saw the gallery for statuary afar off and steered the party away from it. After they had got well past, she and two other girls turned back. They were giggling a little and whispering, and looked about to see if anybody was watching. They walked through and back and through and back again, looking neither to the right nor the left. One of them caught sight of Power's Greek Slave and nudged the two others. They narrowed their walk until it was a sort of circle around this. Their faces got very red, but their curiosity was too great. They passed and repassed until the appearance of the beautiful statue was firmly fixed in their minds. As they passed in to join the others, one said:

"Gee, Jen, ain't she purty?"

"Out o' sight. None o' the girls is in it wid her."

The statuary hall was not popular, and the nuder pictures seemed to be avoided to a great extent. The lower east side has too practical notions of the utility of the human form divine. And in this the lower east side joins hands with the good ladies of Philadelphia.

The picture galleries were crowded the afternoon through, and here the Sunday crowd stood the test very well. True, one man mistook Columbus before Isabella for Mr. Edwin Booth. "Here's Booth," said he, "and he's a playin' the part of Columbus. He is the discoverer of the United States, and that's why they are going to hav the Fair out West."

Everybody recognized George Washington, and Stuart's picture always had a group in front of it. One woman in rusty black, with her hair neatly drawn to a knot under a little black bonnet, edged her way in with: "What yer lookin' at?" "G. Wash," said the wit of the crowd. The woman in black looked awhile and then said, "He must a' been drinkin' heavy when he had that took," which is a most natural remark, considering the very pink complexion in the picture.

All things considered, the Sunday crowd was just as appreciativ as any other crowd, and the hysterical element was left out. The artists whose work was under inspection would hav been well content. There were many appreciativ remarks, some so keen that the appearance of the critic made his criticism seem wonderful. As for those who looked upon the whole thing as a show, they pointed the moral of the cry raised for the Sunday opening. When they shall hav come again and again, they will learn what the pictures and statuary mean.

A Sectarian Victory.

Judge Zane of the United States Court in the Utah district has decided that the tithing office, the gardo house, the historians' office, the church farm, and a half interest in valuable coal lands, property of the late corporation of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, escheated to the United States. In reviewing these cases the court said they came under the laws of Congress approved March 3, 1887, which prescribe that it shall be the duty of the attorney-general to proceed with such steps as are necessary to seize any and all property of the Mormon church in violation of the law of 1862, which declares that it shall not be lawful for the church to hold property in excess of $50,000.

Thus is partly consummated the scheme of the popular Christian sects, using the United States government to break up an unpopular Christian sect. It is a precedent that they may some time be sorry to hav established.

The United States has no more business to interfere with the Mormon church than it has to go into partnership with the Protestant and Catholic churches in educating the Indians.

The Catholic church owns in Utah more than fifty thousand dollars' worth of property, but she is allowed to hold it and evade the law, while the United States officials go clear to San Francisco to seize cash which they think belongs to the Mormon church. Why is not the law enforced impartially? Why are Catholic bishops allowed to hold for their church ten times more property than the limit of the law?

The answer is very plain. The Christians want to break up the Mormon religion because it is a practical application of their own religion—an application they themselvs dare not make—and is a club for the scoffers. Christians, having outgrowe Christianity, desire to destroy the evidences of their guilt.

Dr. J. R. Monroe is Dead.

On another page will be found a sketch, by an old friend of the deceased, of Dr. J. P. Monroe, known to all the Liberals of the country as the stanch advocate of Atheism and the editor of the Ironclad Age. In his paper of the 14th his son tells the story of his death, which, it seems, was not unexpected. The son says:

"Dr. Monroe died in a perfect consistency with the Materialistic views he had so long and ably advocated, and no life-principles were ever more entirely and heroically maintained, even to the very depths of the dark river of death.

"Dr. Monroe's summons to go was not unlooked for, although it came suddenly and with no warning. He had for ten years been in a state of health far more serious than he would consent should be known, saying that extended or frequent parading of his ills might be construed by some to mean that he was aiming to pose as a martyr to the cause of Infidelity, for fame or gain.

"He was engaged in reading proof when death's bolt came, having only a few moments before passed from the breakfast room, where he had partaken of a very scant meal—a few spoonsful of soup and coffee.

"He was reclining on a sof , the members of the family passing in and out of the room as usual. Suddenly he made a cry for a younger daughter, who with other members of the family rushed at once to his aid.

"He was found on the floor, his arms and body resting on the sofa. The supposition is that he had attempted to rise for some purpose, when the heart, thus suddenly overwhelmed, failed, and he sank down to the floor, dying almost instantly.

"Many will miss Doctor Monroe. He was in the highest sense one of nature's purest types of exalted manhood. His leading characteristics were benevolence, charity, and independence of spirit. If at times he appeared dogmatic and self-opinionated, it was for the reason that his excessiv zeal in his opposition to priestcraft brooked no doubtful expression or the occupancy of any middle ground in dealing with or discussing superstition. He was wholly and thoroughly emphatic. He went at once to the root of things. While others may, he failed, to discern a difference in isms. He was an Infidel, pure and undefiled.

"As a writer our readers will bear witness that he combined a withering sarcasm with a romping buoyant humor, which overcame and routed opposition argument, while the opposition advocates were pleased rather than pained.

"As a husband, he was tender and true, and affectionate beyond measure. As a father he was kind, loving and indulgent.

"The burial was under the direction of the George H. Thomas post, G. A. R., of this city, minus the Christian ritualistic exercises, which were kindly omitted at the request of members of the family. To this order Dr. Monroe was very much attached. In early life he was an Odd Fellow, but he had evoluted away beyond and above that twenty-five years and more ago, and at the time of his death belonged to no order save the G. A. R. and the North American Confederation of Atheists, of which order he was the first president if not the founder, and which had his warmest support and solicitude."

So passes away another of the leaders of our band. Dr. Monroe was peculiar, but he was honest and stanch for Freethought, and his death leaves another gap in the ranks hard to fill. May his children honor their father's memory by continuing the work he so heroically began and ably conducted.

The Anarchists of the Correspondents.

A Philadelphia correspondent of a Pittsburgh paper is endeavoring to scare people by crying Atheism, Nihilism, Anarchy, and so forth, and claiming to find some mysterious powder (which the police handle gingerly) in the possession of a few poor Jews of Philadelphia. He has found a "blasphemous circular" which they distribute, and seen some mottoes printed on red paper, and he thinks he has discovered a mare's nest.

But Freethinkers need not be frightened at this attempt to make Atheism responsible for Nihilism. In the first place, most of the stuff written by these sensational correspondents is lies pure and simple. The basis of fact is that there are two sorts of Russian and Polish Jews—the orthodox and the radical. Whenever the latter attempt to meet, the orthodox fellows lie to the police about them, and as the police cannot read the mottoes and circulars, and as they like to break up "Anarchist" meetings, they become willing tools of the orthodox Jews and commit acts of tyranny which really ought to land them in state prison. Then the sensational correspondent gets hold of the news, and the people are told how bad the radical Jews are, how good the orthodox ones are, and how heroic and shrewd and lynx-eyed the police are. It is all rot.

A sample of the charges usually brought against these radical Jews is given as translations of the mottoes found in the hall and of the circular distributed by the Philadelphia "Nihilists." Here they are:

"There is no God; only the ignorant believe there is."
"The people should govern themselvs."
"Three hours a day is enough to work."
"The capitalists suck our life-blood. We hav the remedy in our hands."
"The whole world is our country."
"We want no government, to be slaves."

To a reasonable man there is nothing revolutionary about those, but the correspondent finds the language inadequate to express his horror of such inflammatory words. There were two other mottoes printed in English:

"The whole world is our country; the good of the human family our religion."
"God is the imaginary creation of the fanatic to frighten the weak."

The first is an admirable sentiment from Thomas Paine. The second is more true than horrible. The circular is alleged to say:

"Pigheads only believe in the existence of a God."
"We die and that ends the sting."
"Where is the heaven of which the believers prate?"
"Everything has a beginning. What omnipotent being existed before God in order to create God, and who created the omnipotent power that created God?"

The inaccuracy of the statement of this Materialistic position is probably due to the ignorance of the correspondent. But there is nothing particularly bloodthirsty about the circular, and the breaking up by policemen of meetings in which such doctrins are taught is an outrage which should be severely condemned and resisted in the courts. As for "mysterious powders," undoubtedly they exist in the imagination of the writers of the reports only.

The Anarchists of the City of Chicago.

On the evening of the 12th instant one hundred policemen in Chicago, not drunk nor on an irresponsible expedition, but under the leadership of their superior officer, Inspector Lyman, marched down upon a meeting of men they called Anarchists. "A crashing of glass and the bursting in of the street door, followed by the heavy tramp of the police as they rushed in, was the first intimation the Anarchists had that the meeting was to be broken up. Every policeman grasped his club in his left hand, and his right hand was buried in the breast of his greatcoat with a firm clutch on his revolver."

The police had no warrants, they did not allege that the "Anarchists" had done anything; they simply went down there to "stamp the Anarchists out." But of course the correspondents wrote the affair up to the great glory of the police, and found reasons for the raid. These reasons were that "red bunting hung from the walls," which was dragged down by the police and carried to the station-house as a trophy. "In a dark closet was found a trunk, and upon opening it two silk banners of a fiery red hue were discovered. On one was inscribed 'In union there is strength,' and on the other 'Our martyrs.'" These were also taken to the police station, as was a man who wore "a flaming red necktie."

These are the crimes committed by the "Anarchists"—possession of red bunting, red neckties, red banners, one of which it was afterward discovered belonged to an organization of hod carriers, and an inclination to meet and talk. The correspondents add that "the police, it is said, are in possession of information of a most startling character as to the plans of the reds." Considering the character of the police of Chicago it is perfectly safe to say that this is a lie, but it works with the Chicago public, as any outcry against the Anarchists is believed blindly and unreasoningly. The public even now does not stop to think that the cry is senseless, that the Anarchists whom they hanged were the victims of rascally policemen, who hav since been proved liars, gamblers, and in league with thieves, and that the Anarchist cry is the resort of the police to call attention to themselvs, or to cover up their misdeeds in some other direction.

However, this outrageous raid has proved a little too much for what the Anarchists call the capitalistic press, especially as it turns out that the people arrested were not Anarchists at all, but stockholders and editors of a German Socialistic paper who were holding a meeting. The newspapers denounce the action of the police, and ex-Mayor Harrison in an editorial in the Times said: "The people wish order maintained and the law preserved, but they are not willing to see violated the very charter of our rights to enable ambitious blue-coats to show their prowess. Chief McClaughey is quoted as saying that New York has sent Weisemann here to hurt the reputation of Chicago. If so, New York has found in the chief of police a willing tool to help the Anarchist."

The Herald, referring to Inspector Hubbard's order compelling Anarchists to hoist the American flag at a meeting November 11th in memory of the Anarchists hanged because of the Haymarket riot, says: "The duty to be performed was to arrest any speaker who promulgated treason against the commonwealth of Illinois, to hav competent and truthful witnesses to testify to his illegal words; to take him to the station and hand him over to the courts Instead of doing this simple duty, Mr. Hubbard ordered the president of the meeting to put an American flag on the platform. He had exactly as much legal right to order him to read the Constitution of the United States to the meeting, or the constitution of Illinois, or the statutes on any subject, or the laws and ordinances of the city of Chicago, or the Bible, or the spelling-book. Had the chairman ejected Hubbard, had riot and massacre ensued, Hubbard would hav been responsible. One Haymarket is enough."

The Anarchists of the city of Chicago, it seems, are the police, not the "reds."

What Did the Signers Sign?

The New York Sun, whose editor believes in "God" and pretends to be guided by the immortal principles of the philosopher Jefferson, says:

"The doctrins of the Anarchists, so far as they hav been consistently formulated, certainly contemplate the complete destruction of the existing order of things, the overthrow of the customs and institutions that to most people seem essential to society, and, indeed, to any orderly life whatever. In self-preservation it may seem, then, that society is justified in treating the teachers and promoters of such anti-social doctrins as the enemies of society they actually are by prohibiting their assemblages in public, and raiding their private meetings, as was done the other day in Chicago."

If the editor really believes the latter sentiments of the foregoing to be truth, will he kindly explain what he thinks Thomas Jefferson meant when he wrote:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructiv of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundations on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

What was the tea pitched overboard for? Was King George justified in shooting the colonists? Was the Declaration of Independence true July 4 1776, but not true July 4, 1891? Or did the signers sign a lie?

A Want.

The Columbus Club, a Catholic organization in Chicago, is now demanding the dismissal of Secretary Butterworth from the executiv department of the World's Fair because in response to a toast at a banquet of another club, in giving his impressions of the various states of Europe which he recently visited, he said this of the expense the Italians are under:

"What the church leaves the army takes. If I owned Italy I'd hold an auction and invite all America, and I'd sell ten thousand crucifixes and ten thousand madonnas, and one thousand churches, and I'd establish schools in their stead. The power of the weak old man—I speak it as reverently as I can—is waning."

By the "weak old man" the Catholics say that Mr. Butterworth meant the pope—which he probably did. And now they want him to climb right down and out of the office he holds in the Fair directory. The Catholics are getting so they don't want much.

Editorial Notes.

THE Liberals of Aspen, Col., are preparing to celebrate the birthday of Thomas Paine.

WE wish every one of our subscribers would think of some Liberal friend who ought to but does not take THE TRUTH SEEKER, and then write to him or her about it. We need to double our list.

COLONEL INGERSOLL gave his lecture on "Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child," in Chicago on the 7th instant. Although the Auditorium, in which he spoke, seats nearly six thousand persons, many were turned away, we are told, unable to gain admission. Our correspondent adds: "It seems a pity we hav not a hall large enough to accommodate those who wish to hear him." Does anyone recollect of seeing any complaint of that kind in behalf of any minister of the gospel now on top of the earth?

Secular Thought says of the late Congress of the American Secular Union: "The convention seems to hav been of a very depressing character, the dispute as to the policy the Union should pursue, which has been waged ever since the last convention, having shown no signs of being ended, and leading to a good deal of personal bitterness and recrimination. We should be glad to hope that under the newly-elected officers, the executiv will set itself seriously to work to heal the breach and forward the great object of the Union, though the report upon which we are relying would seem hardly sufficient to justify such an optimistic view."

THE attention of the real friends of Ireland is called to this dispatch from London last week: "United Ireland, of Dublin, to-day publishes an article couched in peculiarly strong language in regard to what it terms the clerical influence exerted in Cork against the Parnellite candidate for the seat in the House of Commons held by the late Mr Parnell. United Ireland appeals to sturdy Irishmen to steel their hearts to the task of fighting the priesthood. While they submit to priest and bishop, the paper declares, they will never be able to follow the dictates of their own political consciences, and the liberty of the land, so long desired, will never be gained." This is what THE TRUTH SEEKER told the Irishmen years ago.

THE Sioux City Journal of October 17th publishes the following prayer, and attributes it to a clergyman of Quincy, Ill.: "O, Lord, we pray that the excursion train going east on the Hannibal and St. Joseph railroad this morning may not run off the track and kill any church-members that may be on board. Church-members on Sunday excursions are not in condition to die; and in addition to this it is embarrassing to a minister to officiate at the funeral of a member of the church who has been killed on a Sunday excursion. Keep the train on the track and preserve it from any calamity, that all church-members among the excursionists may hav opportunity for repentance, that their sins may be forgiven. We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen." This is evidently, as Artemus Ward would say, writ sarkastic. But it is nevertheless a stirring sermon against hypocrisy.

THE "Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor" recently held a convention in Peoria, Ill., and one of the speakers was the Rev. Mr. Hunter, of Indianapolis. His sermon was a denunciation of Chicago and the World's Fair management. He said that if it was decided to open the Fair on Sunday he would lead an army to Chicago and pitch it bodily into Lake Michigan. Then he proposed that Illinois and Indiana secede from the Union and march their cohorts to the capital, seize the government, and execute the members of the national Fair commission. Mr. Hunter went on to tell the astonished young people how to close the Fair Sundays. He laid out a campaign for them by which they were to make life a hideous nightmare for everyone prominently connected with the Fair, and then demanded that the society pledge itself to carry out his plans. A committee proposed a resolution indorsing the closing movement, but the young folks were very quiet, and though they let it go through, the society did not pledge itself to pitch Chicago into the lake, secede from the nation, or massacre anybody. The Rev. Mr. Hunter seems to be an amiable sort of person, but too conservativ for this age. He ough to hav been a co-worker with John Calvin, when his talen could hav had more scope.

THE Oregon State Secular Union has some important work cut out for it by the bigots of Portland. A dispatch to the Seattle Telegraph relates that a committee of citizens and clergy, headed by Archbishop W. H. Gross of the Catholic church, appeared in a body before the city council on the 4th instant and formally demanded the enforcement of the state laws requiring the closing of stores on Sunday. They presented a petition signed by two thousand legal voters, among them some of the most prominent business men of the city. Archbishop Gross made an address to the council to the effect that the stability of the government of the state depends upon the piety and virtue of its inhabitants, therefore Sunday should be observed. The petition was referred. The movement, says the correspondent, is strongly backed and there is strong probability that it will succeed, though the Sunday laws hav not been enforced in Portland for many years. At the annual convention of the Union held in Portland last month it was voted to raise five hundred dollars for Liberal work for the ensuing year and nearly two hundred dollars were pledged. A portion of this money could not be better expended than in bringing to naught this movement of the fanatics.

MR. E J. BOWTELL, who will be remembered by TRUTH SEEKER readers as formerly a frequent correspondent, and writer of some interesting experiences of his life in a Trappist monastery, sends this note from Greenfield, Massachusetts, to the Banner of Light: "On Sunday, the 8th instant, I had the pleasure of making my first appearance in New England as a Spiritualist lecturer. On that occasion I addressed the society here in Union Hall. On Tuesday, 10th, at a special meeting called for the purpose, I related my experiences in the Trappist order of Roman Catholic monks. On Sunday, the 15th, I am engaged to speak for the society again." The editor of the Banner of Light adds: "We understand that Mr. Bowtell is a recent convert to Spiritualism from a Materialistic belief, and that he has already done good work as a speaker at Elmira and Saratoga Springs, N. Y. We trust the friends will keep him busy in his new field of labor." Mr. Bowtell is an Englishman, formerly a member of the National Secular Society, and an editorial writer on the London Freethinker when Mr. Foote was in Holloway jail for blasphemy. While residing in this country he has been employed at his profession of actor, but has occasionally lectured upon Freethought and literary topics. We shall be glad to hear from him now that he has found additional light to guide his footsteps.

THE Methodist Christian Advocate is a little alarmed at the prospect of an open World's Fair on Sundays. Doctor Buckley is evidently afraid that the devil will win, for he wails: "If the Sabbath is to be preserved from desecration under the authority of the government, and the world is not to be advertised that the American Sunday has given place to a European Continental Sunday, much more interest must be aroused and energy exerted. Local, political, and financial interests are combining in favor of opening the Fair, and the politicians know that Christians seldom bolt when trodden upon, and sinners are sure to do it. Every minister, Protestant and Catholic, and every lover of the Sabbath even from a patriotic point of view, should arouse himself and all whom he can reach. Chicago Christians should be a unit. Christian exhibitors likely to occupy large space should address personal letters to the members of the Exposition" We urge the Liberals to be persistent in writing to their state commissioners—a list of whom was given in THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 10th—protesting against Sunday closing, to offset the efforts of the Christians. Incidentally we hope our North Dakota readers will be especially activ in this matter, for one of the Congressmen of that state—a Mr. Johnson—has written Commissioner H. P. Rucker, of Grand Forks, insinuating that he will vote against any World's Fair business unless the Commission shall vote to close it on Sunday. To overcome Mr. Johnson's opposition Mr. Rucker should hear from the people of his state.

THE Detroit Evening News has heard of Anthony Comstock and his work, and this is what it thinks of him: "Anthony Comstock, who has taken it upon himself to suppress immoral literature, etc., should be brought up with a round turn and quickly. Under Comstock's power and impertinence no author is safe if he should happen to hav in any way run up against the censor's prejudices. Last week he seized the proofs of an unpublished novel, called the 'Duplicity of Passion,' after having already seized the plates. If this fellow's actions are within the law it is certainly an outrageous law. He does not hesitate to break open desks and do acts that would send a commoner thief to the penitentiary. The office of literary censor to decide what is moral and what immoral is out of place in a country like this. How does Comstock know that a book or picture is immoral? The question of morality is one that the philosophers of all ages hav sought to define, and still the question is an open one, and to put the determination of such a question into the power of such a meddlesome and tyrannous old man as Comstock is almost unbearable. Already he has been several times rebuked by the courts for his officiousness, but his act of seizing the unpublished novel is undoubtedly no less than theft, and he should be treated as any other thief. It is bad and intolerable enough to hav him meddle at all with other people's morals and affairs when he has as much as he can do well to take care of his own, but when it comes to add what is akin to theft on top of all that it is a wonder he does not meet the fate of a common highwayman. The Comstocks should be made to understand that the highest morality is to mind their own business and let other people alone."

Letters from Friends.

A Hit at Mark vi, 5.

PARIS, TEX., Oct. 15, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I had a little set-to with one of the sky-pilots the other day. He was telling about the amount of power that Christ had—that he could do anything he liked. I asked him how it was that Christ went to a certain place and healed a few sick folks but could do no mighty works. I asked him what was the matter with him that he could not do any great work, because they would not believe. It is so with all miracles. It depends upon the gullibility of the lookers-on. God could not drive the enemies of Juda out of the valley, because they had iron chariots. Was he not a heavy God? I am not afraid of a hundred gods like him. Your friend, A. A. BRADLEY.

A Criticiser of Parsons and Lover of Paine.

GRANT'S PASS, ORE., Oct. 25, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Please find ten cents, for which please send me the book of poems containing "Why Don't He Lend a Hand?" written by Samuel P. Putnam. Since this gentleman's departure from Grant's Pass one of our clergy has tried to reply to his lecture through the press of our town. Now, Mr. Putnam offered the clergy a chance to defend their cause face to face, but not one did there appear to hav anything to say until this gentlemanly speaker was far away. It is simply a repetition of the past, and reminds me of "Once upon a time a donkey kicked a lion, but the lion was dead." I am looking for THE TRUTH SEEKER every mail. In the mean time am absorbed in Paine's "Age of Reason," and wish everybody else who has not would read it.

Yours for truth, WM. M. RICHARDS.

Preachers, Their Chickens and Dimes.

TIPTON, CAL., Oct. 24, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am one of those who hav become subscribers for your paper without their knowledge, having been transferred from the list of Freethought. Our little burg contains one church with a very small congregation. The pulpit is filled at various times by representativs of all denominations, yet among them all they hav not made a single convert for years. We hav a large Liberal element among us, but they are mostly of the say-nothing and let-things-rip order.

S. P. Putnam delivered a lecture here last winter, the only lecture of the kind ever heard here, I believe. I hope he will visit us again this winter.

While preachers receive but little encouragement in Tipton and giv our people a hard name (I should not wonder if one of them would hav the car doors locked while passing through here yet), they do not hav to go far from here to be made happy, for there is a community a few miles from here (in the Lake View school district in this Tulare county and state of California) where gospel sharps do love to tarry, for there are chickens and dimes quite numerous, and the love of the lamb and the fear of hell hav such a cinch upon the minds of the people that they closed their school a couple of weeks ago that the pious parsons of the United Baptist church might hold their annual lying match (I. E. conference) in the public school-house—so much greater is the importance of things celestial than of things temporal in the minds of two of the three directors of the school and with a majority of the people of the district. The main thing to be decided at their last school election for trustees was the question to dance or not to dance in the school-house, when the fanatics showed themselvs to be in the majority. Then the Secularists in the district attempted to prohibit the holding of religious meetings in the school-house, failing in which most of them got themselvs set off into another district. They may hav the consolation of seeing the school-house which they hav helped to build turned into a church where the school-master may hold his sway only subject to the will of the preachers.

Consider me a permanent subscriber, though the waste-basket becomes the final resting-place of this.

Yours for the truth, F. B. HAWKINS.

Some "Mooted" Questions.

FLAT CREEK, LA., Oct. 26, 291.

MR. EDITOR: When I was a thirteen-year-old boy, my father sowed fifteen acres of wheat. When this wheat was harvested I did the binding, and found but one or two bunches of chess in the field. My father having more land than he had labor to cultivate, this piece of land was neither pastured nor planted again for three or four years. The wheat came up voluntarily on it, and the second year it was about half chess. The third year it was all chess, and was thickly distributed all over the field. I had never heard the wheat and chess question discussed, but my eyes told me that the wheat had turned to chess for the want of cultivation. In 1866 Mr. J. B. Willis, of Greenwood county, Kan., broke a piece of prairie land in the spring and sowed wheat on it in the fall and dragged it in with a brush. He turned the sod with an ox-team, and there was a strip in the middle of each land which was imperfectly broken. When his wheat was headed out I went with him to look at it. Neither wheat nor chess had ever grown on this land before, and I observed and called his attention to the fact that where the land was broken it had made wheat, and where not broken it had made chess. I never saw any fact more clearly demonstrated in my life than it was here demonstrated that wheat would produce chess for the want of plowing. Now, I am cautious in using the expression, "I know," but I will here say that if I know anything (I do not claim to be a know-nothing) I know that wheat will produce chess for the want of cultivation. I am not much of a believer, but I do believe that wheat is evoluted chess; that man has made it wheat by cultivation, and that it will relapse back into chess for the want of cultivation. I published the foregoing evidences and conclusions in Home and Farm in 1876 in answer to the question, "Does Wheat Produce Chess?" The old man Hardy, of Indiana, rapped me over the head with a Bible. He quoted Paul and Genesis on me, and said, "Now, dispute that, will you, and make God a liar." The scientific wiseacres and dogmatists spattered me with ridicule and claimed that chess is a distinct species. I did not wilt, but the editor did and closed his columns against me. A few months ago I saw printed on the patented side of the Winn parish Comrade, which is printed by the Vincent brothers, of Winfield, Kan., a statement that a head of wheat had been found in the state of Indiana with a chess head growing out from the side of the head of wheat, containing three grains of perfect chess. Now, if this fact can be verified, and suppose it can, it will knock the seat from under the species dogmatists and let them down. Dogmas and isms are seats prepared for our brains to sit down upon and rest, and when a fact knocks a man's seat from under him and breaks his rest, he gets angry and kicks like a mustang.

I also know that animal hairs can be developed into wigglers, and I know how to do it. Mr. A. Moot may call me a liar and make some liars believe it. He may call me a fool and make fools believe it. He and Mr. B. F. Montgomery are throwing boomerangs at demonstrable facts, which will not hurt me, nor the facts either. If they want to investigate the hair-worm they get off the gorgion. The hair-worm is not there. According to Mr. A. Moot's own statement, he tried to work a miracle and failed. He tried to develop a living animal by feeding a hair on water, which contains only two elements, hydrogen and oxygen. If I could believe that a living animal could be made out of water alone, I could believe that wine could be made out of water without adding anything to it. Carbon, hydrogen, oxygen, and nitrogen are called the organic elements, because all organized matter contains those four elements, and several earthy elements besides. Now, in order to develop a hair into a wiggler the water must contain all of the elements of animal nutrition in a state of solution. If it was not for making this article too long I would giv Mr. Moot specific instructions how to make hair-worms (not gorgions). The hair-worm has not got into science yet, but it will get there. I know that the farmers hav many superstitions, but chess and hair-worms are demonstrable facts, not superstitions, and it hurts science for its representativs to kick at facts. P. F. SHUMAKER.

Proposes an American Freethought Society.

QUAKERTOWN, PA., Nov. 8, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Having been a close observer of the proceedings of the American Secular Union, and wondering what the result would be, I waited, read, and reflected. The Union has certainly arrived at low-water mark and may be said to be at a stand, as the gathering in Philadelphia was unknown undoubtedly to every newspaper published in the city, and if perchance it had been discovered it would hav been a ridiculous bit of news for the public.

About a year ago I believed that the officers of the Union were on the right track, and wrote an article in defense of the movement, to hav it entirely free from religious or anti-religious subjection, but hav since discovered my mistake.

Societies like the Spiritualists, Unitarians, Seventh Day Adventists, etc., may giv kindly notices of a society's demands that are so evidently just, if said society comes with a piteous plaint and petition to be heard, and mentions not their fond dreams and delusions nor holds them up to public ridicule. But the American Secular Union needs financial aid; there is the rub. You can imagin a conversation between the secretary of the Union and a Unitarian clergyman. Secretary: "The American Secular Union, a society with whose objects you are somewhat familiar, is in need of funds to bring the matter of church taxation before our state legislatures. You cannot reasonably deny the justness of our demands, as churches are protected by our government and should pay their pro rata of tax, so I hope you will call the attention of your congregation to the matter and take up a collection for the cause and forward the same to the treasurer of the Union." Clergyman (dumfounded by the audacity of the secretary): "Ahem, well, as I hav a friend waiting for me you will hav to excuse me. I will think the matter over. Good day." Clergyman (soliloquizing): "Ask my congregation to donate to a cause that would put an additional burden on them, when I am scarce able to coax sufficient funds from them to giv me a respectable living and keep the church in a presentable shape! Whew! that is rich! Cheek unlimited! Gall in all its innocence! Perish the thought!" He sees a friend, or thinks of things more congenial.

We must look to our friends for the sinews of war; to the champions of Freethought; to the men and women who are willing to forego a few pleasures of life in order to help overthrow priestcraft and hypocrisy and make the churches honest and just and finally let them die a peaceable and unnoticed death. This must be done by arguments against their creeds and idols; their feelings for these must be injured and broken by the storms of truth and justice.

There are enough Freethinkers in this country to make the churches tremble.

I am in favor of changing the name of the American Secular Union to the American Freethought Society, if the Union survives; if not, let a Freethought congress be called and held some time in the coming March or April. And let Freethought congresses be held in the future in the spring instead of the fall of the year. The secular papers, not being so full of political matter, would hav more space to devote to Freethought congresses. Resolutions passed at Freethought congresses in the spring could be brought to bear on political parties in the fall.

I believe that R. B. Westbrook and Miss Ida Craddock hav endeavored to work for the benefit of the Union and the cause, but hav simply been mistaken as to the proper course.

The past can be forgotten. We must work for the future. Superstition must be destroyed. The gods must be put to flight, and in the places in the human brain occupied by these monsters man, woman, and child will find consideration.

Blame for no one; justice for all. Always for truth,

UKIAH, CAL., Oct. 22, 1891.

T. A. ATKINSON, Reverend Sir: I had not the pleasure or the fortune to be present at the delivery of your two sermons on the exposition of what you call "Infidelity" in July last, but a few prominent points being reported to me by reliable men, I took it upon myself to investigate the charge you made, reflecting very seriously and disparagingly on the reputation of Girard College, of Philadelphia, namely, that there had been six professors murdered in Girard College. This I investigated by writing to different parties, finally to the principal of Girard College, and received the following categorical answer: "Utterly false." I presume you are aware that I published the result of this investigation, with such comments as I deemed appropriate to the case. This I considered both proper and necessary, as a matter of self-defense; in defense of the reputation of one of the grandest institutions known to civilization, namely, the Girard College; and in defense of the class of individuals who hav proved by their works that they are well forward in the front ranks of the benefactors of our race—indeed, not only of our race but of humanity in general—such men as Girard; James Lick, of the Lick Observatory and the public baths for the benefit of the indigent of California; Peter Cooper, of the Peter Cooper Institute, of New York, which consists of institutions, as I understand it, principally for the benefit of indigent orphans; to say nothing of the galaxy of patriots and heroes, the immortal founders of the grandest government known to man, namely, Paine, Franklin, Jefferson, Washington, and the fifty-six signers of the Declaration, fifty of whom were said to be skeptics—or "Infidels," if you please. And you and I are to-day indebted to these very men for the air of liberty we breathe; and yet you denounce them as the most degraded of humanity. But "by their fruits shall ye know them."

Now, friend Atkinson, suppose we turn the tables a little. Who were the men in the front rank of our late Rebellion, the most destructiv and bloody war of modern times, if not of ancient, and in defense and for the perpetuation of that peculiarly "divine institution," which John Wesley denominated the "sum of all villainies?" Were you ever in that category? And did you hurrah at the firing on Fort Sumter? Or did you put up prayers for the success of the Rebel arms, or throw up your hat at the news of the thousands starved and famished to death, the cords of human skeletons, in the Rebel prison-pens? A million of lives sacrificed and billions of treasure; an untold amount of the best blood of the nation on both sides poured out like water—now, which side were you on? And what part did you take in the manufacture of that very gorgeous costume "the bloody shirt?"

Now, in view of the position you occupy in a professedly Southern church, and so far as your sentiments and surroundings are manifest, it is fair to presume your sympathies at least, if not overt acts, hav been and are still with the men who crossed the last ditch in that most despicable enterprise, the disruption and blotting out of existence of the grandest government (so acknowledged) on the face of the earth. Of course I am not aware that you performed all these forementioned acts (hope you did not), but my object is to point to the fact that while you are assuming the privilege and acting on the assumption of dealing out vituperation and detractions on a class of mankind indiscriminately, including many of the grandest benefactors of this age as well as of bygone ages, it may be well for you to look about and see if you are not occupying "a glass house," a quite transparently clear domicil, which may be in danger of collapse about your ears, as the result brought about by your own missils. But be this as it may, it is very evident that in your exposition of what you call "Infidelity" you hav allowed yourself to be led astray, quite wide of the mark of truth and justice; whether through misapprehension, misunderstanding, or otherwise I am not able to say. But as your exposition was given in public, so were my comments and strictures, giving you the opportunity to correct any errors, misstatements, or misrepresentations that I may hav possibly fallen into. But as yet my comments seem to stand undisturbed and indorsed, or at least acquiesced in; therefore they need no correction on my part, but rather are proved to be a necessity in self-defense against aspersion on the character and reputation of Freethinkers. Now, whatever apology you may hav, if any, I cannot conceive of any more charitable and appropriate than that of Paul the Apostle, "I did it ignorantly."

Yours respectfully, THOMAS MCCOWEN.

P S—Thinking it may be possible you hav not seen my comments on your exposition, I penned the foregoing letter; thinking also, as the extracts which I received were second-hand from the original, there might be a possibility of a misapprehension on my part. If such should turn out to be the fact I would willingly stand corrected. T. MCC.

Hair-Snakes and Chess Still Wagging.

LAKE CITY, IA., Oct. 27, 291.

MR. EDITOR: I desire a little space in the good old TRUTH SEEKER on a subject that appears to be much "Mooted." In THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 10th is a letter from that good old intelligent brother, A. Moot, that appears to be in a peck of half-bushels over the errors of his mistaken brothers. Do not fret, my dear old brother; the world is full of mistakes, and although you hav seven years the advantage of me in age, being of seventy-seven years while I am but seventy, you will find there is still much to learn on this much-Mooted question. Mr. Moot's advice in that letter was good, and were he yet a young man, how much he might profit by practicing his own advice. This modern Doubting Thomas knows such a thing as hair-snakes do not exist, while I am just as positiv they do, and hav been seen by thousands. I was talking with one of our most prominent citizens yesterday, who says he has seen these little fellows by hundreds, and put them under a magnifying glass, when he could plainly see eyes, mouth, and everything pertaining to make up a first-class hair-snake—but not equal, or so much to be regretted, as the cuss appearing in the garden of Eden. But perhaps Brother Moot will moot this snake story also. The first little chap I will swear to, having seen and examined one at least sixty years ago. No, no, it will not do to say we know a thing we simply do not understand.

The next thing in order, and more directly concerning myself, is his remarks on the chess question in reply to a letter of mine written some years ago. He is equally positiv in this case that he is right, as he was in regard to the snake, but is it not possible he may be wrong again? All I hav to say is, if he could put new life and vigor in chess under hot-house treatment he has done what others failed to do in outdoor tests in thirty years, by men equally honest as himself and desiring to make a profit out of their chess speculation, but never getting a peck. No, Brother Moot, it will not do to say these statements, trials, and facts reported in my letter were all made from traditional statements, not a word of which is true. If they were it would not reflect any great credit on myself. But I desire to giv another test of wheat changing to chess, that I think will convince any man that is not stone-blind to reason. It is a very simple test, but conclusiv. The test was brought about by tying a calf in early spring on a patch of grass, the rope being so long as to reach from the stake to an adjoining piece of wheat. The eating done by the calf would be in a direct circle. Now for the results. When the wheat came to heading-time this circle or half-moon-shaped ground produced pure chess to the very line where the calf had fed the wheat off in the spring. Now will Brother Moot moot this test also? The wheat appeared perfect until heading-time, when it demonstrated beyond question what thousands of able farmers already knew—that wheat would produce chess under certain conditions. His remarks regarding timothy and timothy meadows will not weaken my case any as presented in my former letter, in the mind of those having seen the changes made in hundreds of cases of a dry season just as I stated. And I am not to blame if Brother Moot has not learned all the mysteries in nature. And in fact, what he and I lack in that direction would make a large book. His uncomplimentary remarks in regard to one of the grandest men—now passed away—that ever lived in Iowa I do not wish to reply to except to say that that good old man's writings will be kept fresh in the history of Iowa ages after he and I are forgotten. The rough terms used by our correspondent are hardly an indication of a refined mind; yet are excusable, as he is one of the positiv kind and cannot believe facts unless they coincide with his own notion, as witnessed by his saying the fact of a horse eating off wheat and chess coming on the same stools was no evidence of wheat turning to chess. I say reason teaches us if that horse's neck had been ten feet long, and he had eaten wheat at that distance in the field, every stool or spear so eaten off at that time would hav brought chess, just as the larger circle did that was eaten by the calf. This calf test was told to me by as truthful a man as livs in the state of Ohio. I would not fear to risk his reputation by the side of the man of cherry-tree fame, and this former man still livs to verify my statement if desired. I do declare that had this calf eaten this wheat in the form of a figure 8 there would hav been presented there a figure 8 in the place of a half-moon as in the former case.

To change the subject—I notice some one has asked if the Freethinkers cannot hav a place in the World's Fair. I hope so. All will surely be willing to contribute for a building, and if the gates are to be closed on Sundays except for preaching, let us hav Ingersoll ordained as our first-best minister to proclaim the true gospel of science, liberty of thought and expression of the same; love, hope, and charity for all the human race in every clime. The above will be a sufficient text for the opening lecture or sermon, and ought not to be objected to by the pious Christian.

My best regards for yourself and all the TRUTH SEEKER family, Heston included. J. L. TOMPKINS.

Not So Cheerful a Life as the Future Will Produce.

NEWARK, Nov. 1, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Since my last letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER I hav met with a very serious loss. My oldest son died on the 8th of September. He was not a church-goer, but a God-fearing man. In his last moments he said, "Father, I am praying for you." I answered him, "My dear son, I am well enough. If there is any efficacy in prayer, pray to God to raise you up, a dying man, and make you well again." He then said, "It is singular that the doctor can't giv me something to help me." I said, "My son, you hav spit up your lungs. There is no power in this world that can help you. You hav but a few days at the most—perhaps but a few moments." "Oh, well," he answered, "everybody has got to come to it." There was no minister at his deathbed, because he had to visit a man sixteen miles away, but there was a young colored woman, I am told, who was washing there. My daughter-in-law called her in and asked her to pray. I was not there when he died, but I am told by several that she filled the bill, and I answered, "Much more so than a great many who make it a business." My son shook hands with her in his last moment to show her he appreciated her kindness, and smiled and died. I was there when the minister came the next morning. He preached a very common-sense sermon. He did not touch on Infidelity, as he did when he preached my mother's funeral sermon. He held forth the doctrin that all mankind would be saved. I was glad when he was done, for I cannot see that any good can come from such appeals to the deity that Christians declare is always near, and yet so far. Out of a family of boys and girls six in number—four boys and two girls—I am the only Freethinker. Our family is all dead but my brother and your servant, who is more dead than alive at present, for I feel that not far from now I will hand in my checks, and I am reconciled to go, for my life has been very dark and stormy; full of perils, toil, and hardship; very little sunshine. Not that I hav done any great amount of good, nor yet hav I done an injury to my fellow-man. I do not think I will be missed when I am gone, for I am like the man who was bragging how well off his wife would be when he slipped his cable. Horace Greeley said, "You remind me of a Cincinnati hog." "How so, sir?" asked the man. "Because," said Greeley, "you are worth more dead than alive." So that fits me exactly. How many more men there are in this world that are dead to themselvs and mankind! All they want is pushing over to end their suffering in this beautiful world. But God help the man who attempts to push me, for I never was really scared but once in my life. That was over fifty years ago. I drove a four-mule team for Buckelew on the Delaware and Raritan canal. I was ordered by the boss to lead to Kingston. The night was very dark, not a star to be seen. Large black clouds were traveling at a lively gait in the horizon. Presently it thundered and lightened, and rain poured down the back of my neck and through the soles of my shoes. As I sat on my intelligent shaft-mule I thought I saw his majesty Old Nick with his toothpick and shovel waiting to brain any traveler on the pike that night. I, boylike, felt like turning tail to and riding back to the station. Reflecting a moment I said, "Wesley, my boy, you are a born coward. If I was to meet the devil I had better bid him good evening than a good morning." So I cracked my whip, as much to scare the devil as to wake up my mules, and said, "Whoa, gee, Rose!" and drove my mules as nigh to where the devil stood as I could get, and reaching out my hand I felt a cold wet tree. I felt ashamed of myself, and vowed that silent tempestuous night that I nevermore would get scared at ghosts, Gods, spirits, or devils, and I hav kept my word. I am more afraid of two-legged brutes—and their numbers are legions—and those ungrateful wretches hav no gratitude, and no remorse for their crimes, and if they are caught and convicted and hanged the priest tells them they are sure of heaven. I answer: "If such people go to heaven, heaven is only fit for Christians and not for readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER Voltaire, Huxley, Hobbes, Paine, Darwin, Jefferson, and hosts of other Infidels hav a parlor of their own, where no devils or devil-Gods exist." W. W. MORRIS.

Three Nights With the Spirits.

NEWARK VALLEY, Sept 2, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: There has been so much written pro and con on the subject of Spiritualism that it would seem the people had already a surfeit of such reading. But the subject of a future existence will no doubt be of the most paramount interest as long as life and thought exist. Four thousand years ago, Solomon's thrilling interrogatory, "Who knoweth the spirit of man that goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast that goeth downward to the earth?" shows that the question was then as now one of the deepest controversy. When the young married lady from Maine—a zealous member of the church—on being brought face to face with "immortality" by the drowning of her husband said to Rev. M. J. Savage, "I hav lost all faith in this all-important subject; do you know anything about it?" she expressed the doubt and heartache of millions of anxious souls. Mr. Savage, one of our most celebrated divines and strongly leaning toward Spiritual phenomena, could giv her no decided answer, no comfort. So it has ever been. The wisest, the most learned, the deepest thinkers hav been unable to giv us any knowledge from the other side of the dark veil—not even a whisper. And it can be safely stated that some of our profoundest scholars and thinkers hav been deceived and victimized by the tricks of so-called mediums and pretended clairvoyants as well as the ignorant and unlearned. In very many instances they hav been caught at their tricks and fraudulent pretensions, while on the other hand, in no instance has any Spiritualist, clairvoyant, or medium been able to establish, or prove, or demonstrate the truth of immortality or the existence of a spirit of a being after death. From all the proof attainable, the earnest desire for immortality is father to the theory. But the earnest desire of a thing is no evidence of its attainment. If it was, we should all very soon make a flying visit to the great fountain of light or to the moon. In other words, we should all be millionaires in a jiffy. For who would not like to be rich or take a trip to some of our far-off luminaries? Crafty men and women in all ages of the world hav taken advantage of credulity, marveling, wonder, to do a thriving business.

By the by, we must not exempt the priesthood. Indeed, they must stand for the largest share of fraud and deception Note the poor dupes now being led away to the expending of their last picayune to visit the "Holy Coat" in Germany—the seamless coat said to hav been worn by Jesus. Talk about your Cardiff giant or Yankee tricks, they all sink into insignificance compared to this Holy Coat business. This may be a digression, but this article is written to show how easily, through superstition and ignorance, people can be deceived—how few people there are that hav the ability to think and examin a subject in all its bearings.

Since the rappings at Moravia I hav always had the most intense desire to investigate the truth of spirit manifestations. An opportunity presented itself some thirty years ago which proved to be the silliest fraud imaginable. But quite recently an opportunity was offered by a lady medium and clairvoyant, who has been said to be one of the greatest mediums in the world for a long term of years, together with her husband, who also claims to be a medium of forty years' standing. All business transactions of the family and all important events are controled and guided by the so-called spirits. Being on quite intimate terms, the gentleman importuned me to come in and witness the wonderful manifestations. Stones, from a pebble up to fourteen or fifteen pounds' weight, came sailing into the room with doors and windows all closed, also letters from dead friends, bouquets, etc. Being quite indifferent and also knowing how difficult it would be for a "greeny" to attempt to catch on to an expert's own game, I gave very little attention to the matter. Finally the gentleman intimated that I was afraid to witness such wonderful manifestations. "My dear sir," I said. "I am neither afraid of Gods nor Devils [why not write Devil with a capital as well as the other fellow?]. I do not see why I should be afraid of spirits. When do you hav another séance?" "To-morrow evening," was the reply. "I'll be there," was my rejoinder. About 4 o'clock the next afternoon my wife and I put in an appearance. We were all placed around the room promiscuously, alternating as much as possible in regard to sex. Some eight or ten persons were present. It was remarked that the manifestations would more readily appear if our minds were occupied with other things than the expected manifestations, so singing was introduced. Soon, while our minds were occupied with the song, sure enough a small object went sailing over a long dining-table, striking on the far end near a third medium who happened to be present from a distance on a visit, and bounded off on the floor. On examination it was found to be a pill-box, inside of which was contained a nicely folded note in an elegant hand from the "spirit band" said to be continually about the family in attendance to this visiting medium. Soon after, another missil came from the same direction, performing the same, and passed over the table, being another note to another person in the room. During the evening stones of a pound weight and letters and bouquets seemed to come from the wall of the house and drop in the middle of the room. The bouquets were quite likely to fall on the ladies' laps. But these missils seemed to come from the direction of a certain gentleman present, who had seemed to be a sojourner from time to time in the family for several years of whom very little was known in the neighborhood. I said to my wife, "These bouquets seem mussed, as if they were pulled from somebody's pocket." After the first night my wife and myself agreed that she should watch the medium and I this strange gentleman whom we believed to be the spirit, spirit band, or confederate. The notes seemed to be in one handwriting and elegantly done. This gentleman I knew to be an excellent penman. Having had quite considerable experience as a teacher and in watching mischievous boys flipping their notes and paper wads, the third night I caught the gentleman tossing three stones and flipping three billets across the room, also the bouquets. The third evening there were about twenty persons present, but only four were able to catch on to the racket. He was so expert the balance present were inclined to think it all of a mysterious origin.

The lady medium went into the clairvoyant state ostensibly, and was by turns controled by the spirit of Paul Castler, M.D., a departed healing medium; Owosso, a celebrated Indian chief; Dr. Hunter, and Lilly, an ever-present Indian guide. But from the manner and language used and contradictory statements made, if space would permit it could be shown that the whole business was a stupendous fraud. Yet people love to be humbugged. But I must say that I hav the best of reasons to believe the proprietor was an innocent victim of fraud and deception.

Spiritualists and Christians seem to be alike in one respect. They both, like the prairie dog, hav a "dodge-hole" in case of an emergency. If the manifestations do not appear according to the medium's statements, "Why, the conditions are not right; there are lying spirits." With the healing medium, if the patient fails to heal, "Why, he hasn't faith enough." This is the same old "creep-out" that Jesus resorted to. He didn't do many mighty works in a certain city because of their "unbelief." This is a mighty small hole for "God" to get out of or into. These dodge-holes are handy to hav lying around loose. It is like picking up a cork just when you want one to stop your bottle. All the spiritual manifestations I hav ever read of or seen do not compare with the jugglery I hav seen, and these latter performers do not claim anything but deception. Did not the Egyptians nearly six thousand years ago imitate Moses's miracles or spirit manifestations as our sleight-of-hand performers do to-day?

It would be very desirable if we could know for a certainty that we could meet our loved ones after death, and so ever be with our friends; and so long as this desire continues, and the crafty can drive a thriving business in luring on that desire, so long people will be cajoled and humbugged. It would also be very desirable if Jesus would or could leave the other two parts of his Godship and come down just below the clouds and remain in sight during one revolution of the earth and say to the people, "I am Jesus of Nazareth; giv up all your doubts, ye skeptics; I am he." How much anxiety and contention it would save. But he will never do it. So we will hav to struggle on in the dark and doubt and die, and the gentleman below will get the greatest share of us. So noted a Spiritualist as Moses Hull stated in the Better Way some two months ago that ninety-seven per cent of the communications through mediums were frauds; that the desires of the applicants to get something from their departed friends were so great and the temptation on the part of the mediums so great that they would yield to fraud and trickery. When I read this, I said, Put the other three per cent in and let the whole business go together.

Children's Corner.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Birds' Sunday.

October, with her gems, made mosaics of the trees;
A truant from the South was the morning's gentle breeze.
The rounded hills were vailed by the autumn's purple haze,
Earth was giving to her children Indian summer days.

He who sings first in springtime, whose coat of vivid hue
Seems, to his eager watchers, a bit of heav'n's own blue,
Rehearsed his olden carol till from the fields around
The meadow-larks and robins in flocks came at the sound.

The whistling blackbirds joined them, and from each maple bough
The birds called to each other, "Prepare for winter now.
The mountain ash berries glow like cherries in the sun;
Its changing leaves are falling, their labor-life is done.

"From countless rays of sunshine, from rain, and mist. and dew,
They gathered all this treasure and stored it up for you.
Assemble all your clans for a long, adventurous flight;
We must cross wastes of water, there'll be wild storms at night."

Then rose the robins' clamor: "Ere we go far away
Our wings should be stronger; we will gather fruit to-day."
Till closed the gates of sunset they came and went like bees.
Chirping, working, singing, they robbed the tall ash trees.

This was told by a leaflet that the wind floated down,
It once was red and golden but now is faded brown.
"The birds," it said, "are heathens and keep no Sabbath day;
Can it be that their instinct tells them the better way?"

Legend Continued.

DEAR YOUNG FRIENDS: Jane was admiring a wild flower when an agent requested her to buy a book. "The object of this work," he said, "is to fetch together some handsome Catholic sentiments." "But," answered Jane, "what good do your books and churches do? Young men insult ladies as they come out of churches. Seth carries a club with him for my defense. What is this country coming to?" "Yes," said a lady passing, "and in Christian asylums the rules of politeness are all laid aside. Good writers tell us that civility is the best religion, including a sense of honor. In these asylums sometimes persons are near starved and no one regards it. Ouida's lazy dog fares better. I know a lady whose dog was named Cæsar Augustus Washington Pompey, and when he died forget-me-nots were placed upon his grave. Christian customs. How much better to show some pity to poor race-horses who are ruined for life that some proud man may reap the benefit. I think we should be kind to insects, animals, and even lizards, for they are so harmless and affectionate. Pious ladies could copy such gentleness rather than the cruel ways of the wild cat and the wolf, which are wild perhaps from hunger."

"I am trying to write a composition," said Seth; "will this do? 'When the spirit of liberty died out in Greece Rome was defended by savage soldiers, but a more noble method remains for us. Freethought children are able to protect our sacred institutions from the ruthless hand of tyranny. While Christian young people are, in company with their elders, sinking down rapidly into the mire of luxury and vice, low manners and ignorance; while gangs of school-children make the street hideous with vulgarity and brutal conduct, the sons and daughters of Infidels will study and plan for a good and a polite education.

"'In a few years the reins of government will fall into their hands, when they can show to the world that justice, morality, and civil manners can preserve inviolate the liberties and best interests of a nation. None can honestly deny that Christians, young and old, have degraded instead of civilized our beloved country.'"

The True Story of a Dog.

In the year 187– the steamship Swallow left the Cape of Good Hope, bound for England. Among the passengers was a lady with a child of two years and a nurse. The lady had also brought with her a huge, handsome Newfoundland dog.

The voyage had lasted about six days. No land was visible and the island of St. Helena would be the nearest point. The day was a beautiful one, with a soft breeze blowing and the sun shining down brightly on the sparkling waters. A large and gay company of the ship's passengers were assembled on deck; merry groups of young men and girls had clustered together; now and then a laugh rang out, or some one sang a gay little snatch of song, when suddenly the mirth of all was silenced by the loud and piercing scream of a woman.

A nurse who had been holding a child in her arms at the side of the vessel had lost her hold of the leaping, restless little one, and it had fallen overboard into the sea—into the great, wide Atlantic ocean. The poor woman, in her despair, would hav flung herself after her charge had not strong arms held her back. But sooner than it can be written down, something rushed swiftly past her; there was a leap over the vessel's side, a splash into the waters, and then Nero's black head appeared above the waters, holding the child in his mouth.

The engins were stopped as soon as possible, but by that time the dog was far behind in the wake of the vessel. A boat was quickly lowered, and the ship's surgeon, taking his place in it, ordered the sailors to pull for their lives. One could just make out on the leaping, dancing waves the dog's black head, holding something scarlet in his mouth. The child had on a little jacket of scarlet cloth, and it gleamed like a spark of fire on the dark blue waves.

The mother of the child stands on the deck, her eyes straining anxiously after the boat, and the black spot upon the waves still holding firmly to the tiny scarlet point. How long the time seems! The boat seems fairly to creep, though it speeds over the waves as it never sped before.

Sometimes a billow higher than its fellows hides for a moment dog and child from the anxious, straining eyes. One can almost hear the watchers' hearts then throb with fear lest the waters may hav swallowed them up. But the boat comes nearer and nearer, near enough at last to allow of the surgeon's reaching over and lifting the child out of the dog's mouth, then a sailor's strong arm pulls Nero into the boat, and the men row swiftly back to the ship.

"Alive?" is shouted from every lip as the boat comes within hail of the steamer; and as the answer comes back, "Alive!" a "Thank God" breaks from every heart. Then the boat comes up to the ship's side. A hundred hands are stretched out to help the brave dog on board, and "Good Nero," "Brave dog," "Good fellow," resound on every side. But Nero ignores the praise showered so profusely on him; he trots sedately up to the child's mother and with a wag of his dripping tail looks up into her face with his big, faithful brown eyes. It was as if he said, "It is all right; I hav brought her back quite safe."

The mother drops on her knees on the deck, and taking his shaggy head in both hands, kisses his wet face again and again, the tears pouring down her face in streams. There is, indeed, not a dry eye on board. One old sailor stands near with the tears running down his weather beaten brown face, all the while unconscious that he is weeping.

Well, as one can imagin, Nero was for the rest of the voyage the pet and hero of the whole ship. He bore his honors with quiet modest dignity. It was curious, however, to see how from that time on he made himself the sentinel and body guard of the child he had saved. He always placed himself at the side of the chair of any person in whose arms she was, his eyes watching every movement she made. Sometimes she would be laid on the deck, with Nero only to watch her, and if inclined to creep out of bounds, Nero's teeth, fastened firmly in the skirt of her frock, promptly drew her back. It was as though he thought, "I hav been lucky enough, Miss Baby, to save you once from a watery grave, but as I may not be so lucky again, I shall take care you don't run any unnecessary risks in future."

When the steamer reached her destination, Nero received a regular ovation as he was leaving the vessel. Some one cried, "Three cheers for Nero!" and they were given with a will. And "Good-bye, Nero!" "Good-bye, good dog," resounded from every side. Everyone crowded around to giv him a pat on the head as he trotted down the gang-plank. To all these demonstrations he could, of course, only reply with a wag of his plumy tail and a twinkle of his faithful brown eyes. He kept close to the nurse's side, and watched anxiously his little charge's arrival on dry land.

He was taken to the home of his little mistress, where he lived, loved and honored, until he died of old age, with his shaggy gray head resting on the knee of the child (a woman now) that he had saved.

His portrait hangs over the chimney-piece of an English drawing-room, beneath which sits, in a low arm-chair, a fair-haired girl, who often looks up at Nero's portrait as she tells the tale of how he sprang into the waters of the Atlantic ocean after her, and held her up until help came.

Spicy Definitions.

A smart, pithy, or humorous definition often furnishes a happy illustration of the proverbial brevity which is the soul of wit. Here are a few apt ones that are evidently spontaneous:

A boy once said that "dust is mud with the juice squeezed out."

A fan, we learn from another juvenil source, is "a thing to brush warmth off with," and a monkey, "a small boy with a tail;" salt, "what makes your potatoes taste bad when you don't put any on."

A schoolboy asked to define the word "sob" whimpered out: "It means when a feller don't mean to cry and it bursts out itself."

A youngster was asked to giv his idea of the meaning of "responsibility," so he said: "Well, supposing I had only two buttons on my trousers and one came off—all the responsibility would rest on the other button."

To hit off a jury as "a body of men organized to find out which side has the smartest lawyer" is to satirize many of our "intelligent fellow-countrymen."

The word "suspicion" is, in the opinion of a jealous husband, "a feeling that compels you to try to find out something which you don't wish to know."

A good definition of a "Pharisee" is "a tradesman who uses long prayers and short weights;" of a humbug, "one who agrees with everybody," and of a tyrant, "the other version of somebody's hero."

A Parisian's idea of chess was "a humane substitute for hard labor."

Thin soup, according to an Irish mendicant, is "a quart of water boiled down to a pint to make it strong."

Of definitions of a bachelor, "unaltered man," "a singular being," and "a target for a miss" are apt enough.

A walking-stick may be described as "the old man's strength and the young man's weakness," and an umbrella as "a fair- and foul-weather friend who has had many ups and downs in the world."

DONALD KENNEDY

Of Roxbury, Mass., Says:

Strange cases cured by my MEDICAL DISCOVERY come to me every day. Here is one of Paralysis Blindness—and the Grip Now how does my MEDICAL DISCOVERY cure all these? I don't know, unless it takes hold of the Hidden Poison that makes all Humor.

VIRGINIA CITY, NEVADA. Sept. 9'h, 1891.

Donald Kennedy—Dear Sir: I will state my case to you: About nine years ago I was paralyzed in my left side, and the best doctors gave me no relief for two years, and I was advised to try your DISCOVERY, which did its duty, and in a few months I was restored to health. About four years ago I became blind in my left eye by a spotted cataract Last March I was taken with La Grippe, and was confined to my bed for three months. At the end of that time as in the start, then it struck me that your DISCOVERY was the thing for me: so I got a bottle, and before it was half gone I was able to go to my work in the mines. Now in regard to my eyes, as I lost my left eye, and about six months ago my right eye became affected with black spots over the sight as did the left eye—perhaps some twenty of them—but since I have been using your DISCOVERY they all left my right eye but one; and, thank God, the bright light of heaven is once more making its appearance in my left eye I am wonderfully astonished at it, and thank God and your MEDICAL DISCOVERY.

Yours truly, HANK WHITE.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

LOOKING BACKWARD

By Edward Bellamy,

Author of "Dr. Heidenhoff's Process," etc.

It is a thought-breeding book, and all who are free to receive new light will find in it satisfaction and inspiration.—[New York Tribune.

The appeal is always made to a man's reason and to his noblest sentiments: never to his selfishness.—[Boston Post.

A suggestion of a really practicable and feasible social state greatly in advance of the present. The romantic narrativ is rich in its forecast of actual possibilities.—[Boston Traveler.

THE

French Invasion of Ireland in '98.

Leaves of Unwritten History That Tell of a Heroic Endeavor and a Lost Opportunity to Throw Off England's Yoke.

By VALERIAN GRIBAYEDOFF.

With a map and numerous illustrations by well-known artists. Handsomely bound in silk cloth. Ink and gold side stamps. Price, $1.50.

The present volume is an effort to rescue from comparativ oblivion one of the many extraordinary episodes of the great French revolutionary war . . . It points a moral that amidst republican institutions like ours, will not fail receive appreciation. It shows, on one hand, the elevating influence of newly acquired ambition, . . . and on the other the debasing effects of Religious and Political intolerance both on the tyrant and the victim. Contains a heretofore unpublished letter of Thomas Paine to the French Directory.

News of the Week.

AT the International Peace Congress in Rome resolutions were adopted in favor of partial military disarmament, the creation of an international tribunal of arbitration, and the establishment at Berne of a permanent International Peace Bureau.

THE Russian synod has decided that no vessels belonging to the church or used at the church service shall be given to a Jewish artisan for repair, and to impose a heavy fine upon the trustees of a church or the clergyman who employ a Jew at any work belonging to their institution.

CATHOLICS are jubilant over the decision of the Supreme Council of Canada pronouncing unconstitutional the law of Manitoba abolishing separate state-paid Catholic schools in that province. However, Premier Greenway will appeal from the decision to the London Privy Council and take the case before the queen.

JAMES DAVIDSON, of New York city, was aroused at 6 30 o'clock the other morning by a crash of glass. He hurried down stairs and found a man in the parlor praying. The man was in his shirt-sleeves, and had broken through the parlor window. "I was sent here by St. John to pray," said the man. Mr. Davidson sent for a policeman.

IT is now doubted that there was any danger of revival of the empire in Brazil. Many say that Fonseca assumed his present position of dictator solely from ambition. He has suppressed liberty of writing and speaking. Only a part of the navy is for him, and the sanguinary scenes of Chili may be duplicated.

ARCHBISHOP CORRIGAN states that Dr. McGlynn can obtain from the holy see a reading of a petition for review of his case only by complying with these conditions: "1. That McGlynn himself make the request and state his grievances. 2 That he publicly condemn all that he has said and done of an insulting character as against the archbishop and as against the holy see. 3 That he be ready to abide by the orders and submit to the judgment of the apostolic see. 4 That he promis to abstain from any public utterance or assistance at any meeting on the matter under consideration."

DR. KEMPSTER, one of the United States commissioners to Europe to examin our immigration, says: "This Jewish persecution is responsible for the poverty of the Russian peasants, and the famin which they are now suffering. Heretofore the Jews hav gone through the country buying the grain as it stands in the field after being cut. This year the Jews hav been so busy getting away from Russian persecution that they hav been unable to buy the grain. The peasants cannot find a market for it, and it lies rotting in the fields. Much of the suffering might be alleviated, were it not for the priests."

THE anti-Catholic Indian school commissioner Morgan has evoked fresh anger from the priests by directing an assistant: "Make special inquiry into the character and qualifications of the employees [of the contract Catholic schools] Compare the course of study in those schools with the course of study provided for the government schools, and point out any defects or any superiority which you may discover in it. It is the purpose hereafter to promote pupils from the contract schools to government schools wherever it is found that the course of study is defectiv or the faculties for industrial training are wanting, or 'for other reasons.'"

PRESIDENT HARRISON has issued a proclamation saying that our "marvelous prosperity" has been "so special that every home has felt its comforting influence. It is too great to be the work of man's power and too particular to be the device of his mind. To God, the beneficent and the all-wise, who makes the labors of men to be fruitful, redeems their losses by his grace, and the measure of whose giving is as much beyond the thoughts of man as it is beyond his deserts, the praise and gratitude of the people of this favored nation are justly due. Now, therefore, I Benjamin Harrison, president of the United States of America, do hereby appoint Thursday, the 26 h day of November present, to be a day of joyful thanksgiving to God for the bounties of his providence."

SATAN MAKETH JOB VERY UNCOMFORTABLE.

So went Satan forth from the presence of the Lord, and smote Job with sore boils from the sole of his foot unto his crown.—Job ii, 7

Gems of Thought.

To explain where I come from, what I am, and whither I go, is above my comprehension; and yet all that is. I am like the watch, that exists without possessing the consciousness of existence.—Napoleon Bonaparte.

IF the Jehovah of the Jews is the real God, I do not wish to be his friend. From him I neither ask, nor expect, nor would I be willing to receive, even an eternity of joy.—Ingersoll.

NOR has the recent history of the United States been less fruitful in lessons. Yellow fever, which formerly swept not only Southern cities but even New York and Philadelphia, has now been almost entirely warded off. Such epidemics as that in Memphis a few years since, and the immunity of the city from such visitations since its sanitary condition was changed by Mr. Waring, are a most striking object-lesson to the whole country. Cholera, which again and again swept the country, has ceased to be feared by the public at large. Typhus fever, once so deadly, is now rarely heard of. . . . This development of sanitary science and hygiene in the United States has been coincident with a marked change in the attitude of the American pulpit as regards the theory of disease. In this country, as in others, down to a period within living men's memory, deaths due to want of sanitary precautions were constantly dwelt upon in funeral sermons as "results of national sin," or as "inscrutable providences." That view has mainly passed away among the clergy of the more enlightened parts of the country, and we now find them, as a rule, activ in spreading useful ideas as to the prevention of disease.—Prof. A. D. White.

DOUBT is the father of knowledge.—R. C. Adams.

ALL church councils are, doubtless, infallible, being composed of men.—Voltaire.

To guard against the enterprises of a haughty pontiff who wished to reign over kings, to shelter their persons from the attempts of credulous nations excited by the priests, several European princes hav pretended to hold their crowns and rights of God alone, and to be accountable only to him for their actions. After a long contest between the civil and spiritual power, the former at length triumphed; and the priests, forced to yield, acknowledged the divine right of kings and preached it to the people, reserving the liberty of changing their minds and of preaching revolt, whenever the divine rights of kings clashed with the divine rights of the clergy. It was always at the expense of nations, that peace was concluded between kings and priests; but the latter, in spite of treaties, always preserved their pretensions.—D Holbach.

ALTHOUGH Christ was to return before the end of the then generation, "all nations" were, by that time, to hav heard his gospel. But, then, poor Christ, although he had helped to "create" the world, had no notion of what "all nations" or "all the world" meant. With him, "all the world" was little more than the limited area in which he had lived and moved as a planer of boards or a spinner of sermons. There were no maps on the wall of the schoolroom where he learnt his Aleph, Beth, Gimel, or A, B, C; and his schoolmaster never said to him: "Well, Christ, my boy, take that pointer and point out to me Rhode Island, Labrador, Patagonia, Australia, and New Zealand." "Christ, my boy," and his father had "created" those places; but it was so long ago that Christ had forgotten all about them, and was of opinion that he could see "all the kingdoms of the world" from the top of "a very high mountain," where he had a lesson in geography from the devil. If Christ had not forgotten the extent of the world he had helped to "create," he would likely not hav expected that his gospel would cover the whole of it, "even as the waters cover the channel of the sea," before the generation he knew had passed away. Peradventure, although he "created" the world in six days, he has been devoting the last eighteen hundred years to cosmography and geography, so as to be en rapport when he comes again with the necessary attainments of a "Redeemer."—Saladin.

Notes and Clippings.

In Chili the Catholic is the religion of the state, but all others are protected by the constitution. The clergy are paid by the government.

At the convention of the Christian Alliance in Hartford recently the Rev. R. Kelso Carter announced the second coming of Christ within four years.

In London, according to the last official criminal returns, there has been a greater security for property and persons in the metropolis during 1890 than in any previous year included in the statistical returns.

Among the many hermits in Maine, John Hallon, of Key's Corner, in Wakefield, is the queerest. He believes in witches, and every night, despite his seventy years, he mounts guard with a shotgun to shoot any hobgoblins that may issue from the hedges.

A late "History of Commerce" says that just as there always is commercial rivalry in the individual, individuals making the community, so hav there arisen rivalries between states, and it has been trade as much as religion which has been at the bottom of many a cruel war.

A cherry tree in a colony of negroes near Lake Contrary, Mo., bloomed recently, and an old colored woman, who is credited with supernatural powers, declared that it was an omen of the approaching end of the world. The colony became excited, held religious services, and waited for the end. But two weeks passed and the excitement began to subside. Then several trees bloomed and all the negroes in the colony packed their household goods and left the place.

While the American Sabbath Union has been attempting to close the barber-shops on Sunday, the Wesleyans, in conference at Grand Rapids, Mich., hav solved the whole problem by deciding that the "mutilation of Nature's handiwork by trimming the whiskers is against the law of God," and instructing the revision committee to "report a resolution against shaving."

One great company has a monopoly of Paris funerals, the idea that has led to its establishment being that enough money might be made out of the costly funerals to permit of a great many for little or nothing. The funerals are divided into ten classes. The first six only are remunerativ. They vary from 8,000 francs to 100 000 francs. The eighth class costs 22 francs; the ninth, 8 francs, and the tenth is free. There are about 35,000 annual free interments. There is talk, however, of abolishing the monopoly.

"Jelly-fish Christianity" is, in the opinion of the bishop of Liverpool, the "great danger of these times." The jelly-fish, though pretty and graceful in the sea, is no sooner cast ashore than he becomes a mere helpless lump. Jelly-fish Christianity makes an idol of Christian virtues, while it proposes to sweep away all denominational barriers. There are thousands of jelly-fish clergymen and countless jelly-fish sermons every year. Legions of jelly-fish students are turned out of the universities, and there are myriads of jelly-fish worshipers; all of which, says the bishop, is the result of an unhappy dread of dogma.

"It is a great mistake," says an architect, "to suppose that men are becoming smaller physically. When I was in Europe, in Munich, we gave a grand ball and the city authorities decided to let the artists hav the use of the medieval armor stored in the museum there. There were only two suits of armor which could be worn by us. These were the suits of giants of that time. The rest, which belonged to the ordinary-sized, strong medieval soldiers, were too small for us. Would this not tend to show that we are larger than our ancestors were?"

Lois Oftedel, a clergyman of Stavanger, Norway, lately accused himself of immorality from the pulpit of his church before a large congregation, in the manner of a clergyman in the United States a few months ago. His family were in the congregation also. At the close of the services he rose with his confession and an appeal for forgivness. Laments were heard on all sides. Upon asking those who forgave him to rise the whole congregation rose. Oftedel is fifty-three years old. In 1882 he was elected to the Storthing. He raised a great political agitation through the country by organizing prayer-meetings, and he gained his great influence chiefly as an apostle of public morality.

The Frenchman Max O'Rell says: "The American is the best-humored fellow in the world. The Westerner may pull out a pistol and shoot you if you annoy him, but neither he nor the Eastern man will wrangle for mastery. If such was not the case, do you believe for a moment that the Americans would submit to the rule of the 'rings,' the 'leaders,' and the 'bosses?' The Americans are the most docil people in the world. They are the slaves of their servants, whether these are high officials or the 'reduced duchesses' of domestic service. They are so submitted to their lot that they seem to find it quite natural. The Americans are lions governed by bulldogs and asses. They hav given themselvs a hundred thousand masters, these folks who laugh at monarchies, for example, and scorn the rule of a king, as if it were better to be bullied by a crowd than by an individual."

A philanthropic lady of the government of Tambov, Russia, who owns several villages, has caused all the liquor stores in her villages to be closed, and established in their stead tea-houses, where peasants can get meat, rolls, and all the tea they can drink for a mere nominal sum. On Sunday she and her husband spend the afternoon in these tea-houses, reading useful books and extracts from the newspapers to the guests. The peasants are greatly pleased with this innovation. The tea-houses are patronized, and drunkenness is almost unknown in those villages where they are established. As the scheme was a suggestion of the novelist Tolstoi, the church authorities at once established a supervision over them, with the special object of preventing the benevolent lady and her husband from reading Tolstoi's works, or any heretical books to the peasants on Sunday. But the philanthropic couple do not mind this, and continue their good work undisturbed.

Angels: What Are They?

It has been said that imagination rules the world. It is true, much that passes for knowledge is nothing but imagination. Along with other cognate fancies, mankind generally has entertained the notion that there exists somewhere in the realms of space a race of celestial beings—angels or demons—much superior to man in knowledge and power of locomotion, who can skip from star to star as we mortals jump a gutter.

The angels belonging to Grecian theology are called gods and goddesses, thereby recognizing both sexes, and many of them bearing individual names, as Juno, Pallas, Minerva, Apollo, etc.—all subject as instruments to do the will of great Jove, the supreme god.

Our old Mosaic scripture furnishes no clue to the origin, sex, or number of angels in its system. Like the Grecian, however, they are messengers and instruments to execute the will of a Jehovah. The Israelites encountered them occasionally without much surprise. This should surprise the modern believer.

The first appearance of an angel in Bible story is when Hagar flees from the jealous wrath of Sarah, who charges Abram with free love and makes it hot for Hagar. Here an angel, instead of alarming Hagar, comforts her. This was the great occasion for the first appearance of an angel in domestic affairs; but it was not the last, if there is any truth in the stories of the births of Isaac, of Samuel, of John the Baptist, etc. No intimation is given that there were any female angels in those days, while meddling male ones bobbed up frequently. The next instance reported is of three angels, in likeness of men, comforting Sarah and making her laugh—though she lied to Abram about it—while he went off to the pasture and fetched a fat calf, had it dressed, set it before the angels, and then stood by a tree while they did eat. Poor Abram!

Soon after this instructiv episode, two of these angels, or two others, called on Lot upon some angelic business. In appearance they were comely young men, and for that very reason, as the story goes, the neighbors made a raid on Lot's cabin. The angels succeeded, however, in abducting Lot and his two daughters; and then, when at a safe distance, revengefully sent fire and brimstone upon all left behind. This was no feminin job. And it was no feminin angel that stopped Balaam's ass. As few Christians ever read the whole of that sacred story understandingly I will epitomize it. A certain chief of a belligerent tribe, on getting wind that Balaam was going to lend his prophetic influence to the enemy, secured the services of an angel accoutered as a knight-errant, to intercept and try to induce him to return. But the Don Quixote rig of the angel braced in the road, brandishing a sword, frightened the ass, which shied off into the field. No instance is given of any woman being frightened by an angel, but in this case the ass is. For some angelic reason the angel is invisible to Balaam, who wallops and goads his ass back into the road. This scene is twice repeated, and then the ass, becoming at once disgusted and inspired, lifts up his voice and speaks or brays a protest. But the fright of the ass saved Balaam's life; for the angel informs him that had the ass not shied he would surely hav slain him. Faith in this angelic procedure has no use for human reason; but let that pass. The fact remains, however, that in this little drama the ass is the most interesting if not the principal character.

There is no direct revelation in holy writ touching the sex function of angels—whether they are male, female, hermaphrodite, or neuter—and we are left to grope our way among the genders. We don't know what kind of an angel Jacob wrestled with all that night.

On reading our old scriptures, though some prophets throw out hints, one never thinks of such a thing as a bad angel; but when we get down to apostolic times, the devil and his angels are spoken of as legions. They hav increased prodigiously by some means, and still remain masculin or neuter. It was not till Christians were introduced to the beautiful specimens of Grecian art in sculptured goddesses that the idea of a feminin angel draped à la ballet was evolved. And then, as Christians always go to extremes, all angels of theirs ever after were beautiful and feminin.

Then the Christians caught another beautiful idea from the Greeks. These so-called pagans already enjoyed a belief in the existence of guardian angels. When they undertook any enterprise, a friendly goddess guided them; when they slept, an angel goddess guarded them from harm. The Christians got hold of most of the stock of the guardian angel business, formed a trust company, and hav claimed a monopoly from that day to this.

Then began the pious work of painting and sculpturing angels all in feminin beauty, clad, if clad at all, in a way that would terribly shock a sniffing Comstock.

But hold! the angel is not yet finished. Geese and buzzards hav wings; yet down to this time no one had thought of tacking them on angels. No angel had ever come on the stage with such appendages. The Christian world allowed the angels to get along somehow without wings for four hundred years from the time that Peter swore that he knew not the man Jesus. In the fifth century one Nonnus, an Egyptian poet, suggested wings in addition to legs as a help to them in flitting from one sunbeam to another. This poetic wing idea was adopted and sanctified by the Christian church, and no angel ever after was carved or caricatured without wings.

The origin, character, and performances of angels were more discussed centuries ago than now. Some Christian fathers argued that they had once as men lived on earth and had been transformed; while others held that much scripture indicates their priority to man. The Koran supports the latter view; it declares that the angel commissioned to prevent Adam from eating the forbidden fruit was, for neglect, changed to a stone. But this question of priority has not yet been settled by any theologian. It is one of those things about which the more we learn the less we know.

But we hav now in paint and marble—sometimes meanly in wood and plaster—the conventional angel, in form and size of a beautiful lass, with gauze-like drapery and the old but neat psyche knot of hair. It is a pretty Grecian goddess, not a meddling Mosaic angel, that watches over our graves.

The vital question still remains: What is an angel anyhow? The man whose mare has won for him a thousand dollars in a race may call her his angel; the wooer will call his loved one an angel until she discards him; and the poet may sing the depths of his love to his angel sweet, his ideal dove; but it is the mother, when she looks upon and clasps her first-born, who knows best what an angel is. Has she not one of her own? And when she looks at the father she may or may not think an angel sent it. From all which we learn that we either make or fancy our own angels.

L. G. Reed.

Respect for the Aged.

There is an idea prevalent among civilized people that the aged and infirm should be treated with respect; their services, if any, remembered to their credit; their shortcomings overlooked; in fine, that they should be objects of universal charity.

This is well, but we sometimes find individual cases in which this rule is flagrantly disregarded.

It is one of these to which I would call the attention of The Truth Seeker family, many of whose members hav been guilty of remarks about an aged and helpless being that were harsh and disrespectful, if not absolutely cruel.

We do not claim to be innocent of the charges we are making against others, but, having repented and come to the confessional, we crave absolution for the past, and ere this spirit of contrition departs we would exhort other members of our family to follow our lead, and cease to spurn the whims, however silly and childish, of a helpless being, whose race is nearly run, and who, ere long, will sleep with his fathers.

But who, we are asked, is the individual who has been so badly treated?

Well, he has had several names, but a short sketch of his career will serve better than any name and perhaps do more to challenge the respect and enlist the sympathy of charitable people than any number of names.

The first really good act he ever did was clogged with a bad one.

He put a man and a woman into a beautiful garden with privilege to eat of everything therein, excepting the fruit of one tree, which, if eaten by them, would giv them unlimited knowledge of good and evil.

Although we hav recommended him to your charity we are not trying to defend him, and we cheerfully admit that he should hav commanded rather than hav forbidden them to obtain this knowledge; but he chose to forbid them, and when beguiled into disobedience by a serpent, the landlord gave the serpent a cussing and sentenced him to crawl upon his belly all the days of his life (Gen. iii, 14).

We submit that this was a little rough on the first teacher of human knowledge and education, but our landlord was then in the palmy days of his youth; he was a little conceited; he wanted his own way, and did not hesitate to enforce his wishes so long as he was able.

The first lesson was a good one, however, and it bore good fruit (Gen. iii, 7), but the landlord was angry, and immediately ordered them to leave the garden, fearing that they would eat some more and get so smart and strong that he could no longer boss them about as he pleased (Gen. iii, 22).

He was generally acknowledged to be the best man in the crowd, for if he got his back up he would commit murder on the instant (Gen. xxxviii, 7, 10; 1 Sam. xxv, 38; 2 Sam. vi, 7; 1 Chron. xiii, 10; 2 Chron. xiii, 20).

The time came, however, when he found that he was not so young as he used to be and his power was on the wane. He received the first proof of this when he tried his hand on Jacob. He hid himself and waited until everybody else was gone. He then waltzed up to Jake and tried to lift him off his pins, but finding that Jake was the best man, he took a foul and put the latter's thigh out of joint; but even with this great advantage, his antagonist was still too many for him and he had to squeal for Jake to let up, but Jake had the deadwood on him and refused to let loose until he got satisfaction for his dislocated thigh. He got it in the shape of a new name.

Such a licking should hav convinced our hero that he was past his prime, and while it certainly did render him a little cautious, it did not lessen his impudence in the least.

He did not again attack anyone single-handed, but he wanted to redeem himself, and allowed he would kick the inhabitants out of a certain valley (Josh. xvii, 18); but when he came to try it, he found that he was not man enough, even with the help of Judah's army (Judges i, 19).

After this he kept himself pretty well out of sight, and when he wanted anybody thrashed or murdered he got up a conspiracy, and managed to hav his accomplices do the work.

He wanted some fun with Job, but after sizing up the latter, and remembering the licking he got from Jake, he concluded not to tackle Job, but got another fellow to do it while he remained in the background and watched the fun.

He used Jeremiah rather badly, but he did not venture into the open ground. He received Jerry, lied to him, shot arrows at him, fired stones at him, and dumped ashes on him, but always from a safe cover and out of Jerry's reach.

He became more and more cautious as he grew older, but his desire for blood and dominion was not abated. It is said that an accomplice of his went after dark into a camp of sleeping Assyrians and cracked every one of their skulls. There were one hundred and eighty-five thousand of them, and when they awoke early in the morning, they discovered that they were all dead corpses, not a living corpse among them (2 Kings xix, 35; Isa. xxxvii, 36). No doubt they felt a little cheap when they got up and found themselvs dead; but we are inclined to doubt the truth of this story, and think it was told for the purpose of terrorizing people into the belief that our hero was as strong as ever, for he always took pains to hide his failing powers and always wanted to be feared.

We are inclined to the same opinion concerning the wisdom and riches of Solomon. We think Sol was bribed by somebody to credit his wealth to our hero. We never knew in what his wisdom consisted, and there are no relics of his riches, from which we conclude that he was rich only in his seven hundred better halves and three hundred sweethearts.

These ruses succeeded among people generally, but there were exceptions, and some of the smarter ones, including Joseph, caught on to the racket.

Mary was a nice girl; she trusted Joe, and—but why repeat the old story of misplaced confidence?

Joe tried to lay the blame on our aged friend, and agreed to marry Mary if she would publish the slander. People believed it for twelve years, and might hav believed it yet, had not the youngster slipped away from his parents, and when they found him Mary was so excited that she gave Joe away (Luke ii, 48). Since that time abuse has been heaped upon the poor old fellow until governments hav been obliged to take measures for his relief. He has been accused of arson with his mouth (2 Sam. xxii, 9). He has been slandered and laughed at for having horns on his hands (Hab. ii, 4), for spitting out swords (Rev. i, 16; xix, 15), for roaring and shouting (Jer. xxv, 30), for waking up and shouting like a drunkard (Ps. lxxviii, 65) for persecuting and killing without pity (Lam. iii, 43), for getting mad and indulging in a little profanity (Ps. xcv, 11), for a little exercise on horseback (Hab. iii, 8), for crying and roaring (Isa. xlii, 13), and for laughing when he was tickled (Ps. ii, 4).

No wonder that we need laws for his protection. He has been assailed at every point. Nobody respects any of his teachings (see "A Search for a Christian"). Nobody obeys any of his precepts. The serpent no longer crawls on his belly, but walks about like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour (1 Pet. v, 8). And even members of The Truth Seeker family hav aided in his persecution, denounced laws enacted for his especial benefit, and all because he is tottering on his last legs, almost ready to pass in his checks.

What cruelty. Do not longer persecute him, but giv him strong drink, for he is ready to perish, and wine, for he is heavy of heart. Let him drink and forget his poverty and remember his misery no more (Prov. xxxi, 6, 7). Let him die in peace.

Locust Corner, O. Chas. O. Hayes.

The Pleasantries and Absurdities of the Confessional Box.

Those serious confessing Catholics who might see an article thus entitled will most probably be astonished to see such an article, and little think that it applies to the confessional-box of Catholicism; but it does. Of course all of us heretics well know that the confessional-box is another invention of ancient and corrupted politicians by compact with the priesthood simply to find out what was going on among the people. But there are millions of persons who, like that unfortunate nondescript book called the Bible, think that the idea of the confessional-box is an inspiration, consequently a holy and sacred institution. We are not prepared to say that it is not an inspiration, because there are good and bad inspirations, just as well as there are good and bad people. While the original uses for which the confessional-box was created are fast disappearing for want of a perfect system in maintaining it, and on account of the heretics who do not confess, and of the other religions who do not recognize it yet, however, like every other "thing" on earth, it has evolved itself with many things and uses for good and bad purposes as well as for pleasantries. At first confessions were public. The guilty person would publicly accuse or acknowledge himself guilty of some offense, and as publicly would receive his penance. Some penances were as ludicrous as were some of the offenses. While some of the offenses were as black-hearted, and rewarded with the same black-hearted penances or penalties, such as the famous pillory, an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth—in a word, it was the lex talionis, the law of retaliation. While some of the offenses confessed at the present day are heinous crimes, the priestly absolution eradicates all traces of the act, and rewards with a gentler penance of long prayers. Sometimes the confession of minor offenses meets a penance of the same type. The effect of the confessional-box on many minds is so absurd that if it was only to prevent the further stupidity of certain people it should be eliminated from Catholicism, if Catholicism is sincere in keeping step with this progressiv age.

To cite examples of the stupidity we mention here we will relate some incidents that are gathered from our personal observations and some that hav been related to us by persons who were once under the baleful influence of that box, as well as observations related to us by persons of unimpeachable veracity. In a certain parish of Louisiana, about fifty years ago, there was a little abandoned village where the priest passed only once in a year. He would remain a few days, and during that time would receive the confessions of all, preparatory to the Sunday mass and communion. In that little deserted village there was a boy of eighteen summers who happened to behave so badly every year that his grandma considered him an unfit subject to go to confession, communion, or mass. He therefore did not go to confession until he was eighteen years of age. He wore his long dress—better explained by saying that it was a sort of "Mother Hubbard." Sunday came about, and having gone to confession, he was allowed to go to mass for communion. His sister sat in front, his mother behind, his grandma after, and he behind this last good, pious old lady. In the course of the service his mother struck his sister in the back for some negligence, which was promptly reprimanded by a stronger blow on the mother by the grandma, with some words. Our youngster, seeing this, struck his grandma in the back what he considered a gentle blow, but as he was of splendid physique his gentle blow sent his grandma sprawling on the floor, sending his mother, in her fall, in the opposit direction, while the young man stood up with both hands clasped in prayer as if he had never moved. When the explanation of his conduct came about he very blandly said that the priest had told him in the confessional-box to sit behind his grandma, to watch her closely, to sit down when she sat, kneel as she did, and, in fact, to do everything he saw her do. Having seen his grandma strike his mother, he simply followed instructions. We hav seen ladies go to church and wait a whole day, to the detriment of everything else, to confess to one particular priest, because, as they expressed it, "He was so stiff and always givs a good blowing up." Others hav almost blasphemed another priest because he put no questions, but only listened and granted absolution at once. Others in the same case considered that such a confession was worthless, and immediately went to another church, where the priest would propound an endless series of questions and scold them at each answer. Others again will refuse to confess to certain priests because they "don't know how to make you cry." We hav seen old men and women brutally push persons aside to get themselvs in the confessional-box alone to hear mass, saying that it brought them luck. Another says, "I will not go to that priest, because he is too gay, and his absolution cannot be of the kind that is forgiving." One in particular declined to go to a priest because he always had a smile on his face and consequently could not absolve her from sins. One declined another priest because he failed to question her thoroughly on small matters. When asked as to whether she had not told him all that she thought was a sin, she said, "Yes." "Well, then, if you told him all and you received absolution, why not be satisfied?" The answer spurted out with a tinge of anger that it is his duty to question, and she wants to forget nothing because she desires to appear before God with a clean conscience. This same person does absolutely nothing but go to church at every opportunity, and does little or no favors to any one, besides living on the charity of strangers. Some of the absurdities confessed are sometimes so foolish that the priests themselvs, from the altar or the pulpit, speak them out and advise what to confess. From the pulpit a priest once announced and took up for his subject an item of the confession of one of his parishioners. She had confessed, as a sin, that she had only a small piece of bread left for herself and children as a beggar passed by, and before she had the opportunity of giving him a piece, through her negligence one of her children had taken it out of her hand and eaten it before she could stop him. She asked if the gravity of her sin had not been somewhat lessened by the "good beating" she had given the boy. Another heavenly soul had confessed to refusing to giv money to a beggar because she had only a twenty-five-cent piece and she had no means of getting change.

An old country farmer confessed that he had taken a few cocktails in the morning to brace him up for communion; that he found out his sin by an accidental conversation with his wife on his return from the church, which was many miles away. A young man of about twenty-five confessed to having looked in a restaurant window and having envied the good things therein. A boy of twelve confessed that he had eaten too many cakes, which he thought had made him sick. A young lady of twenty confessed to having said that she "loves her sweetheart above all things in earth or heaven." An old moribund of seventy-five confessed, on his deathbed, that he always felt that he "loved wine better than anything else." An old maid, finding out that she had no more sins to confess at the end of the year, because she had confessed and taken communion every Sunday of the year, confessed all her sins over again, and was indignant at the priest and actually insulted him because he refused to hear the whole story once more; she actually charged him "with conspiracy to send her soul to hell." A blind man, on being told by the priest that his confessions were senseless, was overheard in the confessional-box to answer: "I don't want to go to purgatory for having forgotten anything that I think is a sin." A smart and well-to-do young merchant bidding goodbye to a company of visitors, asked them to excuse him—that he was going to mass; that he had never missed his mass since he "was born." On being asked what effect would it hav on him if he missed, he answered: "It's a mortal sin, and then I'd hav to confess this; I would not be so guilty for anything in the world." One of the company accompanied him on the way to mass, when the conversation turned on business. He started by boasting of a transaction of the night previous in which he said: "He was too sharp, and I could only charge him regular figures, but you bet I caught up on old Tom Black. He came in right after, and, the blind old fool, I charged him at least thirty per cent above regular rates. I made up on him what I lost on the other." Such is an idiosyncrasy of the confessional-box, if we are permitted to call it an idiosyncrasy. On being reminded that such tactics were somewhat irregular and apparently contrary to the good teachings of his church, he unhesitatingly said: "The church's got nothing to do with this. This is business. And any time I hav an advantage of making money in that way, I'll do it." "Will you confess this as a sin?" "Get out, man! That's a trick; a business trick." This confessing young gentleman must be a strong opponent of the "church and state doctrin."

A negro, having gone to confession, confessed to having stolen "only a rope," in the long list of thefts as to which his confessor questioned him. It having come to the knowledge of the priest that this negro had stolen a horse, he was astonished to hear the negro deny this theft. The idea struck the confessor to beat hard around the bush, and he therefore played on the rope. He asked him how did he happen to steal the rope. The negro answered by saying that "de rope were tied around de trunk ob a tree on one en'"—and stopped there. The question came as to whether there was anything else tied on the other end of the rope, which was hesitatingly answered with a "Y-e-s!" but "I didn' took 'im, he follered me, he did, the boss, so he did, I jus' walked and he follered me, I never pull him once, I kin swor to dis."

Another negro, having been questioned as to theft, was asked: "Hav you stolen any chickens, ducks, geese, horses, mules, dogs, pigs, eggs, or any kind of fowl?" He answered, "No, siree; ne'er a wunce!" This negro met an old negro woman friend of his who asked him how about his confession, as to whether he had made a good one, received absolution, and if he was going to communion. He answered, "Yes, indeed, deah; I'se made a fuss-class confession and got solution and all dem sort o' tings." She says: "Go way chile; you's mistaken. Is de preas done ask you to 'turn dat turkey what you stole?" "Why, no, deah. He dun ask me if I stole everything down to a fowl an' I said no. But, if he dun ax me as I stole turkey, I was gone, I was, dead giv way. He never axed me turkey once, he never did. I jus had a fowl on him dis yer time."

Speaking about penance, we hav heard persons complain that they hav been ordered "only one set of beads," and sure that was no penance at all. Another had been ordered to recite the Rosary and the Seven Dolores of the Virgin for thirty days and considered this a reasonable penance for not having been to confession for six months. Some were condemned to fast for forty days, and acknowledged this "just penance for my sins." Some were ordered to say a dozen "Our Fathers" every day at 12 for a week and admired this a light penance. Some hav been refused absolution and sent off for a month, and boasted of the severity of such a sentence, as it was highly complimentary. Some, having been forbidden as a penance amusements for a year, hav announced it to whomsoever wanted to listen to it and made bets that they would keep it up. Others, being asked what they liked best, and answering "fruits," were given as a penance for several months abstinence from fruits. All these penances for the performance of any act are always joined to a series of unending prayers, and especially of those prayers that recall, almost at every word, the sufferings of some of the saints or Jesus Christ. In our observations we hav remarked that generally the strongest penances are given to the most bigoted, or fanatics and foolish persons, and the light penances to persons who, in our opinion, might not take so very much to detach them from such nonsensical practices. Thus could we go on if it were not tiresome to even recount such senseless stupidities, and no doubt some may find them so foolish as not to read this article to the end, only it does good to expose these things, either by writing or speaking them. It will meet the eye of some and arrest the attention of others, and when the time comes to abandon and overthrow these silly things of ancient superstition, everyone will be imbued with a more earnest desire to work a radical change.

President Schroeder to the Members of the Oregon Union.

ARAGO COOS CO., ORE., Nov. 1, 1891.

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE OREGON STATE SECULAR UNION.—Dear Friends: Your secretary, Mrs. Sarah U. Todd, recently notified me that at your last convention you had honored me by electing me president of your organization. The cause of my not attending the convention I learn was fully explained, hence it is unnecessary to touch the matter here.

While I am at any time willing to serve you and our just cause in any position for which my acquirements and ability are suited, I must say that I hav never aspired to so exalted a position.

Thanking you for the honor conferred I accept the same, regretting, however, that some one better qualified and more centrally located was not chosen.

Yours fraternally, J. HENRY SCHROEDER.

ARAGO COOS CO., ORE., Nov. 1, 1891.

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE OREGON STATE SECULAR UNION: I hav just mailed a copy of the following letter to Governor Pennoyn.

There was no time to lose to call attention to this matter.

I request each vice-president to write me that I may obtain his address.

Yours fraternally, J. HENRY SCHROEDER.

ARAGO, COOS CO ORE., Nov. 1, 1891.

TO SYLVESTER PENNOYN, GOVERNOR OF THE STATE OF OREGON.—Dear Sir: The time is now at hand in which you will no doubt issue the usual annual Thanksgiving proclamation. I would, therefore, respectfully call your attention to the following facts:

That our constitution does not authorize any servant of the people to issue proclamations of a religious character. Our government is civil and should be as it was intended, strictly secular.

Every citizen should hav the right where, when, how, and whom to worship, and thank, or not, according to the dictates of his conscience.

I therefore respectfully request that in the forthcoming Thanksgiving proclamation you exclude the customary mention of religious observance.

In making this request I voice the sentiment of the Oregon State Secular Union, an organization of many respected citizens of our state, and which has for its object the complete separation of church and state. Yours respectfully, J. HENRY SCHROEDER.

Pres. of the Ore. State Sec. Union.

News and Notes.

The campaign for Southern California opened most favorably at San Diego Sunday evening, November 8th. A large audience was present. The lecture was given under the auspices of the San Diego Liberal Union, which has a membership of about one hundred and thirty. Mr. A. E. Horton is president, and Ranford Worthing secretary. Mr. Horton presided at the Sunday evening meeting. The platform was beautifully ornamented with flowers, furnished by Mrs. Ranford Worthing and Mrs. F. F. Wright. Mrs. Lilan Schmidt sang a solo, a pleasant introduction to the lecture, which was upon "The Demands of Liberalism."

In spite of "hard times" the Liberals of San Diego will keep things on the move. They hav confidence in the future, both of Freethought and the beautiful city wherein their lot is cast. I shall be here for three Sundays more, and can hereafter write more fully of the prospects of this attractiv place.

On Monday I wended my way in a roundabout fashion to Perris and San Jacinto. The railroad is washed away between Oceanside and Temecula, and the Santa Fe company hav neglected to rebuild, consequently the passenger is compelled to go about three times as far by way of Orange and East Riverside, and not only does he suffer this extra travel, but he must pay for it, making the fare three times what it should be. I must confess that I was a Farmers' Alliance man while taking this journey, and fervently in favor of a little government control of these monopolies. It is bad enough to make one travel a hundred miles instead of thirty according to the regular route, but to make one pay for that extra ride is simply an outrage.

I was surprised and pained on my arrival at Perris to hear of the death of P. A. Clark, of Diamond Valley. He died on Saturday, November 7th, and was buried on Sunday. He had been sick for about ten weeks at Dr. Wright's Hot Springs Sanitarium near San Jacinto. He died peacefully without a struggle at the last. He had no fears of death. Bravely he lived and bravely he died—a Freethinker. He was respected by all who knew him. He was a man of enterprise, and did more for the development of Diamond Valley and vicinity than any other resident. He was a stanch supporter of the Liberal cause. In him we hav lost a noble and generous comrade. His memory will be cherished with affection and honor.

I arrived at San Jacinto Monday evening. I found that Mr. John Vernon had made all necessary arrangements for the lecture, and there was a good attendance. G. W. Thurston, formerly of San Francisco, is now in this valley. G. W. Thurston, Jr., and wife and children are present; also the Demings, ever ready to aid the work. Geo. F. Hunt, Geo. H. Deinstadt, G. W. Thurston, and S. A. Hubble join THE TRUTH SEEKER ranks. So I find that San Jacinto is still in line, although many of the stalwart friends I first met are gone away. John Vernon, and others, however, stand by the colors, whatever the fortune of war.

It is a beautiful evening after the lecture, and in the mellow luster of the queen of night flooding all the valley and hills and the forest, I pass, with Dr. Wright for my guide, and a pair of lively colts to hurry us forward, to the Hot Springs Sanitarium, and after a bath in the strengthening waters, I sleep until morning opens upon my view a dazzling panorama. On one side a wide forest stretches to the shining hills, in front the plains spread until they are lost in the blue fringe of mountains. Farms, orchards, vineyards, greet the sight. Along the horizon glitter crowns of snow. The lovely valley, like an emerald sea, breaks against jagged walls and abrupt precipices, and out of its bosom tower fantastic mounds. If ever I get weary and worn, and desire repose and dreams, I guess I will come to Hot Springs Sanitarium. The doctor and Mrs. Wright are genial hosts; they do take good care of the patient. The waters are exhilarating, whether taken inwardly or outwardly, and the scenery, from the rugged mountain wall behind, over the extensiv valley to the azure rim of luminous hights in the changing silver and gold of day and evening, is a delightful panorama. Here one can gather health and strength, and dream and hope in charming solitude. Too soon in the early morning I had to leave for other fields of labor.

I was pleased to meet in the doctor's family Mr. and Mrs. M. G. Stone, who are Liberal companions indeed, and added to the enjoyment of my visit. Tuesday morning I sped my way to Paris. At the station the world-renowned "Topsy" greets my view, the gallant nag who has borne me over many a mile of this sunny land. My old friend, R. C. Reed, is in the buggy, and transferring the luggage I am whirled away through the dust to my evening's appointment. First, however, we stop at the halfway house, the ranch of Mr. and Mrs. Graham, who hav just moved up from San Diego and are trying the comforts of a rural life. After resting an hour or two in this cheerful home A. L. Reynolds takes us over to his ample "mansion," where I am to lecture. After the lecture there is a dance. No hall could be procured in Perris, and so we try this plan out in the country. We hav to initiate all sorts of ways to get a hearing for Freethought. A pretty good number are present, and I do the best I can. On the whole the arrangement is successful. We had a splendid sociable time after the lecture. All went in for the enjoyment of the occasion. The violin and the organ made melody and young and old joined in the festiv circle. It was after midnight before the music ceased and the guests departed. I was obliged to be up at 5 o'clock to take the morning train. However, it was after 6 o'clock before any of us awoke; then there was hustling. There was about forty minutes' time to make the train, a distance of six miles. The horses, Anna and Weesie, got down to it finely and thundered away like the wind. Their names shall be chronicled in News and Notes, for they did their duty nobly. We reached the station ten minutes ahead of time. This shows that California horses can beat the world. There is something in the Pacific atmosphere that givs them vim. Among our friends to meet us on this trip are C. C. Reid and Mrs. Brown, of Myrtle Point, Ore. Mr. Reid had the care of my friend, P. A. Clark, in his last sickness, and will remain in charge of Mr. Clark's affairs at Diamond Valley.

Reynolds, the senior, introduced me at the lecture. All the Reynoldses were with us. I think there are about seventeen grandchildren in the family now, and every one will be a Freethinker. That is a good way to improve the world.

There are quite a number of Liberals at Perris, Winchester, and vicinity, and I hope to come again and keep things on the move.

Well—we hav a rattling campaign at Escondido. The first time I came here it was as quiet as a grave at my lecture. Not a smile was cracked. It was like the day of judgment. Everybody held their breath. This time the hall was crowded, and the audience evidently enjoyed the discourse. Both sides were represented. There was a fusillade of question and reply. I gave two lectures. On the first night the "Rev." Mr. Stewart took the platform and made a few remarks highly interesting. He declared that he indorsed a part of the Demands of Liberalism. He was not in favor of a Sunday law, but he hinted that unless one believed in the Lord Jesus Christ he were in danger of hell-fire. The elements would melt with fervent heat. Where then would the Freethinker be? Would not he then wish he had believed and been baptized so that he might keep cool amidst these burning worlds?

This opened the ball, and on Friday night at my closing lecture the clergymen were on hand—several of them. My subject was "Freethought and Morality." I challenged discussion. The first to respond was Citizen Durand. He was quite excited. I thought at one time he was going to climb the platform in his efforts to defend the faith. I asked him if he was a Christian. He said he was. I asked him if he was willing to stand the Bible test; would he swallow poison and handle snakes. He said that was not in the Bible. I asked him if he hated father and mother, etc., as Jesus commanded. He said that was not in the Bible. By this time he was wild and it seemed as if he would demolish the building. He said Freethinkers would come to nothing. I told him that was a great deal better than to go to hell-fire. Finally I asked him if he loved his enemies. He said that he did. I asked him if he loved me, the Infidel lecturer. "Of course I do," he answered. "Do you love me?" he thundered back. "Yes," I answered. That mollified him and he good-naturedly left the field. Then the Rev. Mr. Ellis, I believe, of the South Methodist church, put a few questions, mainly as to my once being a clergyman. I told him I had been a clergyman, and that I was just as honest when I was in the pulpit as now—only I did not know as much. That ended his attack. The Rev. Mr. Carlisle then took up the gauntlet—a pretty Liberal-minded man. He does not believe in the immaculate conception and some other things recorded in the scriptures. But he seemed to think it was a bad thing not to believe in God, that it was necessary to morality to hav faith in some kind of supreme being. He asked if Atheism did not lead to Nihilism and free-love, etc. I told him no—that all morality sprang out of human relations and human sympathies. There was no need of any God to make a man good, there was nothing higher than human love, human justice, and human virtue. If he was naked and hungry upon the hills, no god would ever help him, clothe or feed him, but man, and man alone. We must depend upon one another and help one another, and that is the source of the highest moral action. Then Layman Dixon had his say. He is kind of lawyer-like and Socratic in his method of discussion. He asked questions in a way that was "childlike and bland." He asked if genuin Christianity ever persecuted; if it is not a false form of the Christian religion that tortured, imprisoned, and burnt; was not toleration taught by Christian preachers, and did not the Freethinkers of France persecute and slay during the Reign of Terror, and was not our government mainly the result of Christian effort. I answered that the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution were altogether Freethought documents; there was not a particle of Christianity in them. I affirmed that the founders of the republic were non-Christians, Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, and Thomas Paine. I told him that the Freethinkers of France persecuted mainly on account of political offenses, and not on account of religious opinions, and that Thomas Paine was the chief one, at the risk of his life, to protest against such wrongdoing, which was not in accordance with the principles of Freethought. I said, however, that the French Republic in the Reign of Terror did not put so many to death as Queen Elizabeth did in order to establish the Episcopal church. The Episcopalian church of to-day is founded in the slaughter of nearly a hundred thousand Christians. I said that persecution was the logical outcome of the Christian religion; that it was the direct result of the teachings of Jesus and St. Paul. According to the Christian religion unbelief is the greatest of crimes, and is worthy of the severest punishment. Unbelief is worse than murder—murder kills the body, but unbelief kills the soul—the immortal soul, and that is an awful sin and must be crushed, even by the slaughter of millions.

I offered to debate this question at a future time, and to meet all of the clergymen of Escondido, and demonstrate the proposition that by its very nature the Christian religion is committed to the persecution of unbelievers. I hope some clergyman will hav the courage to meet this challenge and demonstrate, if he can, that Christianity is a religion of peace and good will to men. It is a religion of war and bloodshed, I maintain, and I can prove this by history and its own sacred book, the Bible.

The audience were intensely interested in the debate, and Liberals are satisfied with the outcome and want more of it. Anything to set people to thinking.

I lectured Thursday evening at San Pasqual, but I did not hav a large audience. Our Advent friends won't come unless I talk on the Sunday question. Then they will applaud, but they do not wish to hear both sides of the religious question. Our Advent friends are good as far as they go. We hope they will go farther. Some of them do. This used to be known as the Valley of the Advents, but now it is known as the Valley of the Infidels. The Freethought flag is flying.

I spent the day at B. B. Rockwood's ranch. This is a delightful place. The hills inclose it and the land produces every variety of fruit. The water from the mountains sparkles through the grove and orchards. This is a place for comfort, quiet, and poetic meditation. Rockwood is a philosopher. He has a large library, and plenty of Liberal papers and pamphlets, and he keeps them on the move. He has converted half the valley, I guess, and there is no let-up to the Freethought tide. It rolls on.

I also enjoyed at Escondido the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. Hindman. They are stalwart Freethinkers. Stevenson Brothers and John Eanes are on the roll of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Mr. and Mrs. Bates, the Olds Brothers, Mr. Cravath, in whose hall the lecture was given, Mr. Anderson, Mr. Frank Fleshman, W. L. Wilhite, of Valley Center, Mr. Latte, and others join in this campaign. I was pleased to meet with Miss Lillie Rowe, the daughter of W. E. Rowe, of San Diego. She is teaching school in the vicinity of Escondido. Mr. and Mrs. W. E. Rowe and James Bidwell are among those to greet me at San Diego. I enjoy the hospitable home of Mr. and Mrs. Ranford Worthing, where pork and beans giv the flavor of New England life. Our friends are from the vicinity of the "Hub," and radical Boston mingles with the magnificent scenery of this "New Boston" of the Coast.

Also at the New Carleton the Secular Pilgrim finds the same genial hosts, Mr. and Mrs. W. A. Dorris. I hav not finished my story of San Diego, where I find the best of friends and generous assistance.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

San Diego, Nov. 15, 1891.

State Organization.

The necessity for a systematic propagandism of the principles of Freethought is so self-evident that it will be admitted at once, and it is indeed strange that no definit plan of organized action has been pursued among Freethinkers. True, we hav had our organization, but through the despotic sway and fallacious policy of a self-elected dictator it has been completely sold into the hands of its enemies. There hav been several suggestions made whereby an efficient organization could be maintained in our midst, but these suggestions, jointly or severally, remain a dead letter unless they can be put into practice. Our chief trouble in the past has been to open our doors to all shades of opinion, thereby rendering us incapable of exercising any opinion of our own, and that which we desired so much to teach to others has been grossly misrepresented and abused. What we want is leaders that are capable of leading and followers who are willing to follow. Of the latter we hav an abundance, but for the want of the former not only ours but many other righteous causes hav gone to the wall.

With the object of effecting some concerted plan of action among Freethinkers the following circular will in a few days be spread throughout the state of Ohio:

TO THE FRIENDS OF FREETHOUGHT: Recognizing the necessity for an organized plan of action among Freethinkers, whereby we may be enabled to carry on a spirited advocacy of our principles by a well-defined and systematic propaganda, I hav been advised by many prominent Freethinkers in the state of Ohio to take steps toward effecting a closer consolidation of our party. Several friends hav already pledged their moral and financial support to help carry the scheme to a successful issue. With this object in view a mass meeting of the Freethinkers of Ohio will be held at Columbus on Sunday, the 5th day of April, 1892, to then and there organize and form a state Secular Union of Ohio. The advantages to be derived from such an organization are many and may plainly be seen. First, it would hav a decided tendency to stimulate and localize individual effort, thereby resulting in more positiv good to your own locality; secondly, as an organization within the state we could procure from the state legislature a charter of incorporation, thereby establishing ourselvs as a legally organized and constituted body, and which would enable us to demand and obtain those national rights and privileges so long denied us. All Freethinkers are earnestly invited to attend this meeting, and are asked to giv what assistance they can (financial or otherwise) toward making this undertaking successful. Remember that upon your individual efforts to disseminate the truth depends the true salvation of the human race, and if you cannot take an activ part in the fight for human freedom, you might at least assist and encourage those who can; therefore we urgently call upon you to stand by us in this project. It is certainly the duty of every Freethinker to render what assistance he can to help to sustain an aggressiv and vigorous Freethought propaganda. Those willing and ready to help are requested to forward what subscriptions they can reasonably afford to John R. Charlesworth, care of E. P. Wright, 638 N. High st., Columbus, O. All communications will be acknowledged in THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator. Signed on behalf of the committee,

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH.

Committee in charge: E. P. Wright, Columbus, O; D. W. Smith, Alliance, O; J. M. Putnam, Quincy, O; V. D. Manson, Jr, Shreve, O; S. M. Bower, North Baltimore, O.; P. H. Mc rosky, Caryaville, O.; Marius Heighton, Kent, O; C. C. Germann, Bloomdale, O; L. B. Silver, Cleveland, O.; Dan Pfouts, Nashville, O.; J. Chevellard, Millersburg, O.

I hav not taken this step upon my own responsibility, but upon the advice of many prominent and influential Freethinkers throughout the country, who recognize the necessity of some such plan. Certainly we liv in the midst of an energetic organization for ecclesiastical purposes. The church with its rich endowments, its fine buildings, and imposing appliances for success, its colleges for education, its Bible societies, its young men's associations, and so on down to the tea parties and other coteries, are all activ and well supported for the ceaseless propagation of the dire doctrins of supernaturalism. There is certainly a most ample preparation for spreading error, but what means do we possess for propagating truth? Hav we as good? Or let one ask, Hav we any? And the answer must be, No. We hav no system, no endowment, and now we hav no organization. It is now time that the deception practiced upon us heretofore shall cease; our movement must become a power and not a mendicity; a great fact, and not a great sham; we must hav leaders who will work, and not sit idling the time away begging for subscriptions to pay the salaries of lazy officials; or it will dwindle into obloquy, and disappoint the hopes of many noble and well-deserving men. Then let us hav an organization, Infidel in character, and one whose principles shall not be hidden by the false gloss of honeyed phrases, and one capable of raising attention to our views in every city, town, or hamlet from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH.

Books in Fine Bindings for Holiday Gifts.

We hav a large number of books suitable for holiday gifts, many of them in extraordinarily fine bindings, and we call the attention of our readers to them, hoping that when selection of presents is made the list will be consulted and purchases made therefrom. Among them are Paine's works, complete, in cloth. $3; leather, red edges, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4 50; the World's Sages, in same style of binding and at same prices as Paine's works; Ingersoll's Prose Poems, in cloth. $2 50; half morocco, $5; turkey morocco, $7 50; tree calf, $9. These are magnificent volumes. Also his principal lectures bound in one volume for $5. Either of Miss Wixon's books, The Story Hour, Apples of Gold, All in a Lifetime, is very suitable for a present, the first particularly for children. Voltaire's Romances, cloth, $1 50; half calf, $4, is a fine and uncommon work. D. M. Bennett's Around the World, in sets of four volumes, profusely illustrated, red cloth, $6 50, is a splendid present to a friend or to young men and women. It is full of practical to-day information about other countries and the noted things therein. The latest book which the Spiritualists are discussing is, Was Abraham Lincoln a Spiritualist? for $1 50. Helen Gardener's Men, Women, and Gods is a work of great value, $1, as is Winwood Reade's Martyrdom of Man, $1 75; Gibbon's History of Christianity. $2; Darwin's Origin of Species and Descent of Man, and others of his works. A catalog containing these and hundreds more—Freethought, scientific, medical, social, as well as standard—will be sent on receipt of a request for same.

Send Stamp for printed Letters to Congressmen on the Sunday opening of the World's Fair. When you receive them, address them to your Congressman, sign your name, and send them to him at Washington, D. C. And if you can afford to, put in something for the Literature Fund, which enables us to print these letters.

The American Secularists.

From Secular Thought.

The spicy report in Secular Thought of the convention of the American Secular Union, lately held at Philadelphia, suggests a few comments. Having had the privilege of being present during the proceedings, I can testify that THE TRUTH SEEKER'S account of the meeting is strictly accurate and not overdrawn. I shall not soon forget the interesting personality of each speaker, nor the forcible and sometimes blunt utterances with which they regaled us. A brief sketch of the persons who took the prominent part in the discussions may help toward an appreciation and better understanding of their position and efforts.

Dr. Westbrook, an ex-minister and lawyer, is a handsome gentleman, with a strong, clean-shaven face and a well-shaped head, thickly covered with iron-gray hair. His face expresses the resolution and determination, which were abundantly evidenced in his address and remarks; for never did a presiding officer make less effort to conciliate opponents or harmonize conflicting elements. His opening address bristled with thrusts, "straight from the shoulder," at adverse critics, who had expressed discontent that the policy of the Union had been to discourage the work of Freethought propagandism, and he gave scathing rebuke to Liberal papers which had on some occasions used very impolite language about the Christian God. The whole tenor of his proceedings gave the impression that some deep-seated antagonisms had for the time usurped control of his feelings and kept in abeyance expressions about the great work of Secular reform in which it is well known that he is deeply interested, of which he has given good proof by work in his own methods. However one might regret his strife-provoking utterances, one could but admire his resolution and pluck, and, not knowing all the grievances that impelled him to take this course, one could but withhold criticism in view of his manifest earnest sincerity. Dr. Westbrook is said to be a Theist, but is thoroughly rationalistic in his views of the Bible and the dogmas of orthodox religion. The Secular cause is fortunate in having such a friend and advocate, and if he does not labor in the way some would wish, the cause has so few workers and the need is so great, there is good reason to rejoice that so much learning, cultivation, and ability are enlisted on this side.

The first question put to me when I seated myself in the hall (by a lady, of course) was, "Do you think Miss Craddock is pretty?" Before long, I had to say that she was certainly charming. Miss Ida C. Craddock, who has filled the office of secretary, is a young lady of attractiv appearance, intellectual gifts and refined manners, who brings both ornament and aid to the cause she has espoused. She is said to be a sort of Liberal Unitarian in religious sentiment, though, like Dr. Westbrook, a thorough Freethinker in her rejection of what orthodox Christians call "revelation." She was suffering from a severe throat affection that prevented her from reading much of her report, which was a fine literary effort and gave a clear statement of the work done by the Union in the circulation of reform literature. But when the controversy began, the lady found means of utterance, and repeatedly sprang to her feet, saying, "I rise to a question of fact," correcting in hoarse but ringing tones statements that were inexact. She invariably proved her claims and manifested both accuracy and courage. Her eager voice, flashing eye, expressiv face, graceful attitudes, and dramatic gestures were the most interesting features of the occasion; and when I was invited to go to the theater in the evening I declined for the reason that I would not obliterate the impression of the genuin action of Ida Craddock by witnessing the feigned acting of any dramatic star.

Mr. T. B. Wakeman, of New York, who voiced the dissent of the aggressiv Liberals, is an eminent lawyer in the prime and vigor of manhood, who, with an exceedingly distinct and fluent utterance, possesses a remarkable facility of expression that evidences a powerful mind and a clear head. He is a Positivist in religious belief and one of the stanchest of Liberal reformers. His great contention was that the Union ought to take activ measures to promulgate the Secular philosophy as a means of securing Secular reforms and establishing Secular morality and a Secular state. He is a most impressiv and effectiv speaker and an antagonist that few would venture to meet in debate, unless very confident of their position.

Dr. E. B Foote, Jr., is well known, in connection with his father, as sustaining a large medical practice in New York, publishing a health monthly and several valuable books, prominent among which is "Plain Home Talk," a book that tells people what they ought to know about their bodies, but which Christian prudery keeps them in ignorance of. Dr. Foote made a fine impression upon the convention by his conciliatory manner and courteous way of expressing dissent, though clear and uncompromising in his views.

Another speaker, well known in Liberal circles, was Edward W. Chamberlain, of New York, a lawyer and a gentleman of refined manners and cultured tastes. He has been prominent in his opposition to Comstock's sneaking persecution of earnest reformers, who hav escaped from the control of Christian obscenity and see purity in the human nature and organism, and who in plain language are advocating some of the reforms that are most essential to the advancement of society. He has been concerned with the defense of Moses Harman of Kansas, who, for telling in plain words, with the best of motivs, the outrageous abuse of a wife by her husband, has been sentenced by the efforts of the rightly called "obscenists" to five years' imprisonment. He has also cooperated with the Doctors Foote in an unsuccessful attempt to liberate a victim of the pious Wanamaker, Ezra H. Heywood, confined in Charlestown prison for two years with six hundred malefactors, for the use of plain words about sex matters in a paper devoted to social reform.

At a reporter's table sat Eugene M. Macdonald, stolid and silent, taking no part activly in the convention, but it could be said "a chiel's amang ye takin' notes, and, faith, he'll prent it." The broadside in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 7th shows that the pen is mightier than the tongue.

Another notable figure was C. P. Somerby, business manager of the Truth Seeker Company, long a publisher of Liberal literature and an earnest friend of Rationalism and economic reform. With him was his sister-in-law, Mrs. Ida M. Batchelor, who was proposed as a candidate for the secretaryship in case the headquarters of the Union should be established in New York. Her business experience with the Truth Seeker Company, combined with her personal qualifications, would hav made her a worthy successor of the other gifted Ida.

But the Union has gone to Chicago, and Judge Waite, author of "The History of Christianity," is the new president, and Mrs. M. A. Freeman, the present secretary of the Chicago Secular Society, and a well-known worker for Liberalism, is appointed secretary.

My intention was to comment upon the attitude and prospects of the Union, but I hav used up so much space that this had better be deferred till the next issue of Secular Thought. What interested me most in the convention was to become personally acquainted with the Liberals, so well known to me already through their earnest words and works, and in these imperfect sketches of a few of them I hope to share some of my enjoyment with the readers of Secular Thought.

Lectures and Meetings.

MR. WILLIAM Q. JUDGE informs us that Mrs. Besant is in this city on a short business trip, and will speak three times in Chickering Hall. She left Liverpool on the 18th and returns December 9th. November 30th she talks about "Theosophy and Reincarnation;" December 2d she discourses upon science, and on December 6th she speaks upon a subject to be hereafter announced.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH'S lecture appointments are as follows: November 15th, Beloit, Kan.; 16th, 17th, 18th, Industry; 23d, 24th, Doniphan; 26th, 27th, Eagle, Neb.; 29th, Hamburg, Ia.; December 6th, Ottumwa; 16th, Aurora, Ill.; 21st, 22d, Lexington; 23d, 24th, Strasburg; 27th, 28th, Centralia; 30th, 31st, Waterloo, Ind.; January 10th, Columbus, O.; 11th, 12th, Shreve; 27th, 28th, Farmdale; 29th, Pittsburgh, Pa.

S. P. PUTNAM'S lecture appointments in California: San Diego, November 8th, 15th, 22d, 29th; San Jacinto, 9th; Perris, 10th; San Pasqual, 11th, 12th, 13th; Santa Ana, 16th; Anaheim, 17th; Los Angeles, 18th; Monrovia, 19th; Savannah, 20th; Tulare, December 1st; Hanford, 2d; Lemore, 3d, 4th; Oakdale, 5th, 6th; Lodi, 12th; Stockton, 13th; Gridley, 15th, 16th, 17th. Mr. Putnam will lecture the first four Sundays of January in San Francisco on "The Evolutions of a Century." Subject of first lecture, "Evolutions—Theological and Religious;" of second lecture, "Liberalism, Spiritualism, and Infidelity;" of third lecture, "Industrial Evolutions;" of fourth lecture, "Political Evolutions." January 29th there will be a grand Paine celebration at Union Square Hall. On the following Saturday and Sunday, January 30th and 31st, will be held the state convention.

FREE TRADE.

To illustrate how money should be free, I hav likened its circulation to the blood of the living organism. To make the simile more complete I would liken trade and its channels to the circulation, while money should constitute the living protein of the blood, and society the organism. Trade and commerce build up society and money as a free medium of exchange facilitates the process. All should be free and unimpeded and a perfect natural order would result.

"When we assert," said Bastiat, "that all men's interests are harmonious, when we thence conclude that they naturally tend and gravitate toward the realization of relativ equality and general progress, it is surely from the play and action of the laws governing human transactions, not from the perturbations and disturbances, that we educe harmony." It has been said that the free trader had all the theories while all the facts prove the benefits of a high tariff. And what are the facts? Why, simply that government is enabled to tax foreign goods. That is to say, make foreign merchants contribute largely to the support of this government, when tariff is for revenue only. Protection tariff enables home industries to combine and add a fictitious value to their goods. In the first instance it is "taxation without representation." The highway robbers demand, "Stand and deliver," while a protection tariff enables a horde of inland robbers to impose an outrageous tariff upon consumers. Tariffs, taxes, and licenses levied or issued in behalf of government or for the benefit of private enterprise are a hindrance and obstacle to trade, and a source of unearned profit to the undeserving, the prop and mainstay of government—hence a detriment to society. Let me call your attention to government again and beg your indulgence of my iteration of what I believe to be a fundamental principle. Government began a usurpation of men's right. It continues an established wrong. It is nonsense for men to speak of it as "a function of society;" better call it an abscess on society. Neither is it made by society, but in spite of society. It ignores the individual and his interests as much to-day as when the robber chiefs called their lieutenants together to devise means whereby they might increase their wealth and powers. It is this confounding of society with government that enables government to pursue its course of usurpation and oppression. If this government was a foreign power that took possession yesterday, pursuing the course they are now pursuing would cause a social revolution within a month. It is the feeling that we hav had a hand in organizing the present force of government and that we expect to take a hand in reforming it that allows the monstrous wrongs to go "unwhipped of justice." Pa Chase tells us in his "Letters to Farmers' Sons," "Whatever restrictiv legislation there has been against the poor has succeeded wonderfully; whatever restrictiv legislation there has been against the rich has failed wonderfully," but he fails to see that what is true of restrictiv legislation is true of all legislation, and must of necessity be so so long as the political machine is in the hands of the politician.

"Pa" Chase is a free trader like his teacher Henry George, but his assumption that government should monopolize the issue of money and yet never interfere with trade is only equaled by the Prohibitionists who would prohibit the importation and sale of liquors yet acknowledge men's right to drink. The right to drink carries with it the right to sell. The right to make money carries with it the right to regulate trade.

While "Pa" Chase has emancipated himself from many of the superstitions of government, his theory that money is a product of government only, and can be issued by no other power, displays not only a profound ignorance but proves him a victim of a superstition which throws the gods of India into the shade. Of course he means a "legal tender," and I admit this is an invention of government, signifying a force sufficient to compel a man to accept it, but he has no right to limit money to this definition. His idea that it should be so limited shows his theory of a non-restrictiv government to be peculiar at least—restricting money to a purely legal tender, thus obliging men to accept a piece of paper bearing the stamp of government and the legend "This is a dollar" for real value to that amount. The idea that government by its fiat of "Thus be it enacted" can transform a piece of valueless paper to the equivalent of a sack of flour, a bin of wheat, or a house and lot, opens up, it seems to me, a vast field of enterprise. For if government can make a legal tender for debts, why not for potatoes or corn, and thus avoid all trouble in trade? This eternal haggling over the price of commodities would be at an end. By all means let us hav a legal tender for commodities. Let the government issue bills inscribed, "This note is a full legal tender for one bushel of potatoes, one barrel of flour, or one yard of calico, and all men are hereby commanded to receive and accept the same.—Ruler." I throw out this suggestion. If "Pa Chase" wishes to elaborate the idea in another series of "Letters to Farmers' Sons," he has my consent, and I shall interpose no obstacle to his obtaining a patent on the process, even if he should restate his opinion that "All writers of books and magazine articles should be ashamed to copyright them, for as they freely received so should they freely giv." Still I am not disposed to condemn Mr. Chase for taking advantage of laws of which he does not approve, even as I would hold a man blameless who should steal some of his property back from a thief.

Tariffs, taxes, and licenses disturb and derange the tendencies of trade, which naturally would establish reciprocal relations. Instead, these robbers upon the highways of trade are taking from the producer, rendering him no equivalent, and giving to the non-producer, thereby creating the great injustice in the distribution of wealth which we everywhere behold—the idle in enjoyment, the worker in woe. Henry George illustrates these robbers along the highway, placing at the end of the line the one who "takes all that is left"—the land monopolist. But while he would cut off some of the robbers, he never thinks of putting a stop to the robbery. He does not propose to kill the landlord. Oh, no; he would dress him up in uniform and call him government. But the private landowner must die; this officer in uniform will tax him to death. Strange that people cannot see that the nature of a principle is not changed by being enacted by government. Taxation charged to rent would be taxation still, and land values, the product of private ownership in land, would not exist unless government exercised the prerogativ of private ownership. Like "fiat money" the single tax rests upon an ideal value; one is the creation of government, the other the creation of the community; both are a myth. When the single taxer talks of free land and free trade

Trust him not, he is fooling thee.

There can be no free trade under government. When government ceases to interfere with trade, it will cease to be government. Neither can there be free land or free money. Freedom is impossible under government. Can a man be governed and be free? We talk of government officials as servants. They may be servants of government, that is themselvs, but they are masters of the people. The fact that we choose or elect them makes our servitude none the less real, and but for the tariff and indirect taxation government could not exist. "It has been found," said Mr. Butterworth, of Ohio, "that the imposition of a customs duty collected on goods imported from foreign countries into the United States presents fewer objectionable features to the popular mind than any other system of taxation." Why should it not? "The popular mind," not liking to pay taxes, is only too glad to "impose" upon foreign goods or a foreign people. And I see by Lucifer that a Republican official of Kansas, in an address at Valley Falls, made the boast that "the tariff out of which the last Congress raised $1,000 000,000 in two years to pay the expenses of the government, was paid by foreign merchants and producers, and that it was right and proper to thus make them pay." A monstrous "imposition" truly. And this shows to what a depth of dishonesty politics will lead a man. Now add this robbery of foreign producers to the robbery of home producers, and ask yourself what would be the consequence if the people were asked to pay that amount in a direct tax. I think their action would demonstrate that they thought the game not worth the ammunition.

Now, the word tariff descends to us from an old Spanish town, Tarifa, in the straits of Gibraltar, where an old Moorish chieftain had intrenched himself and was enabled to demand a tribute from all passing merchant ships. It was robbery then, it is robbery now. The fact that it goes into the coffers of government makes it no less a robbery. Strange that we will make this distinction! If an individual does this thing he is called a pirate and merits death at the yardarm. A poor old woman passes my door, whose trembling limbs can scarcely support her weight and the basket upon her arm. She has to pay the city a license for vending her notions and keeping herself from the poorhouse. Suppose an individual should force this money from her. You would mob him. One of our police justices, disgusted with the performance, has openly said that the city was receiving an income from prostitutes by the police "running them in" whenever they had accumulated a little surplus money. A tariff for revenue only? If we trace back to its source the revenue that sustains the city, state, and nation, we shall discover it a thief along the route, taking from honest toil its just reward—a vampire living upon the vitality of the laborer. It vitiates trade at the start by preventing the producer from receiving an equivalent for his toil. It thus discourages production. It is being discovered that most if not all the famins of the world may be traced, not to the soil yielding an insufficient production, but to the tariff taxation that deprives the husbandman of the little the earth gives him. Free trade is impossible so long as this little giant robber is enabled to levy his tribute upon all, but the rich can shift his burden upon the shoulders of the poor, who, like Atlas of old, must bear the burdens of the world.

Ye hav shorn and bound the Samson, and robbed him of learning's light,
But his sluggish brain is moving; his sinews hav all their might.
Look well to your gates of Gaza—your privilege, pride, and caste—
The giant is blind and thinking, and his locks are growing fast.

A. L. BALLOU.

My Lecture Trip.

Completing my Iowa list of engagements, I again resumed my journey westward, and arriving at Lincoln, Neb., I spent a whole week vainly trying to arrange for a series of lectures; so finally I resolved to go straight on to Dorchester, my next place to lecture. I was down here for two lectures, which I gave on the 28th and 29th of October. I was met at the depot by W. J. Jennings, a stanch old Freethought veteran, who immediately took me in charge and ministered to my material wants. Mr. Jennings and wife are an aged couple. They are earnest Freethinkers, and strong adherents to the religion of humanity. Mr. Jennings has been a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER since its first issue by D. M. Bennett, and they assured me that they now regarded it as a member of the family and could not do without it. Dorchester is a small agricultural town of about five hundred inhabitants, situated on the great rolling plains of Nebraska. It has a large and earnest Liberal element—according to population—who had looked forward with great eagerness to my lectures. The meetings were well attended; indeed, on the second night scarcely an empty seat could be seen, and at the least computation I had more than one-half of the inhabitants in attendance, and this notwithstanding the fact that the Baptists had arranged a counter-attraction in the shape of an entertainment accompanied by an address from some divine, illustrated with stereopticon views. A local scribe took down both of my lectures in short-hand, with the intention—as I afterward learned—of handing them to some ecclesiastical Goliath for the purpose of subjecting them to a tearing criticism, but after I had gone, of course, and circumstances would prevent me from defending myself.

I was very pleased indeed to meet with such earnest and generous Freethinkers as J. W. Gilbert and family, who had driven a distance of eight miles to hear my lectures. Mr. Gilbert's generosity has upon several occasions found its way into the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Many Liberal friends rode into town from quite a distance, whose names I can not now recall. My efforts in Dorchester were attended with satisfactory results, and I hope that the friends of this district are as well pleased thereat as myself. From Dorchester I went to Friend, where I enjoyed a few days' leisure at the hospitable home of Friend Gilbert. It is situated on a beautiful farm, which only a few years ago was rolling prairie, but now farm products can be seen in every direction, the fruits of man's labor. I gave one lecture while here in the district school-house on "Bible Morals," which was very well attended, and for the first time some of my auditors heard a stern criticism of the teachings of the Old and New Testaments. How strangely impressiv are such conditions as one meets with here! Only a few short years ago this was a vast, idle wilderness, with the prairies stretching in every direction; but now the tinkle of the cow-bell can be heard in the distance, the hum of the threshing-machine, denoting human activity, strikes upon the ear, which, with the plaintiv sighing of the wind through the vast rows of corn, mingled with the faint gurgle of the little stream which ripples past the house, forms a somewhat pleasant melody. It is now threshing-time; the farmers are busy preparing for the winter's storms, totally ignoring the divine injunctions of Christ, to "take no thought for the morrow." What an unchristian community they are! Nevertheless, they found time to attend my lecture, and listened to what was said very attentivly. The journey to the school-house was a strange and novel undertaking to me. We had to ride there in a buggy, with a party proceeding on foot leading the way with lanterns. Mr. Gilbert is indeed a true Liberal. He has served with credit as a county official and has fulfilled a term in the state legislature. Although his religious opinions are known far and wide, he has the respect and good feeling of everyone in the district. While here I had a telegraphic correspondence with Capt. A. D. Searl, of Leadville, Col., with reference to a series of lectures in that place, and which finally resulted in an agreement to visit Leadville for that purpose. So, taking a hurried leave from Mr. Gilbert and family, I started for a long ride over the great Rocky mountains en route for Leadville. What impressions were made upon my mind during this journey! What scenes to stir the heart's best emotions! What scenes to enchant the mind! What thoughts are called up! What a change from the shaded hills and wooded glens to the vast boundless prairies, with never an object to break the monotony of your vision; nothing to be seen but the brown dried-up grass stretching in every direction as far as the weary eye can reach. Truly this is a wonderful country, say what you will; everything appears to the eye of the traveler on a grand and magnificent scale. Here are rivers which seem the outlets of ocean; vast inland lakes, almost seas; boundless prairies, and an almost trackless immensity of forests. Here civilization and barbarism meet. Here in the depths of the forests, where once the red man knelt to the Great Spirit, cities hav sprung up, temples to "other gods" hav been built, colleges and schools hav been erected, and sources of countless wealth and incalculable progress hav been developed. Science, with daring hand, as if in defiance of all natural obstacles, has swung mammoth bridges across the rivers and creeks, and has carried over almost insurmountable mountains the steam railway. The Indian trail and hunting-ground hav given place to this great iron highway, binding together this great continent in bands of iron. Where the war-whoop of the savage once resounded the shriek of the locomotiv can now be heard.

Hyar wunst the Injins tuk thar delights,
They fished, fit, and bled;
Now the inhabitants are mostly whites,
With nary a Red.

During this journey I experienced for the first time the joys and pleasures that fall to the lot of the Liberal lecturer; owing to an accident to our train we were delayed three hours, so that by the time we reached Denver I found myself too late to make my connections for the West, and I was consoled with the assurance that I should hav to lie over in Denver until next morning. Alas, with what means? It was indeed a sad, disconsolate, and gloomy outlook for me. For what consolation could be found in having to stay over in a strange place, with twenty cents in your pocket? This was my condition. Oh, how the voices of the hotel runners grated upon my ears as they shouted out the names and rates of their respectiv houses. It was a bitter cold night, but I was not going to die in a fog. In less than an hour I was safely ensconced in comfortable quarters, although "circumstances" will necessitate my return to Denver. I rose in the morning to catch an early train, when a fresh difficulty beset me. My train had gone, and they refused to recognize my ticket on the route whose train was about to start, and informed me that I could not leave Denver until 7 o'clock in the evening. This would not do for me. At that hour I was advertised to speak in Leadville. I had twenty minutes to spare, so hurriedly disposing of my ticket at a small discount, I purchased another for the train that was just leaving, and had barely got seated when the bell began to ring and the engin gave forth a consumptiv whistle to announce its starting. Words cannot describe my feelings as the train slowly glided out of the depot. Heaving a heavy sigh of relief, I looked backward at Denver with feelings of pleasure and mingled pain. Nine hours' ride over the great Rocky mountains, first through a narrow gulch, then down a great canyon, now up the mountain sides, over vast plains, then up another climb, finally brought me to Leadville. Here I was met by Capt. A. D. Searl, who is acting as secretary to the Leadville Secular Union, under whose auspices I was to giv a series of lectures. Upon my arrival snow was falling fast; the captain asked me why I had brought such weather with me. But I assured the gallant gentleman that it was already there before my arrival, at least so I judged from the appearance of things. During my stay here I was the guest of Captain and Mrs. Searl, whose hospitality I thoroughly enjoyed. Leadville is situated at an altitude of eleven thousand feet above the sea level. It is built in a beautiful and luxuriant valley, and is entirely surrounded by high-towering mountains, keeping constant vigil as it were over the little city like grim and gaunt sentinels, whose tops are covered with almost perpetual snow. It has a population of sixteen thousand, and is in the main a wealthy mining settlement. The air is exceedingly rare and fine, and on a clear day one can see to an enormous distance. I experienced great difficulty in breathing when I first arrived here, but this gradually wore off as I got more accustomed to the finer atmosphere. I giv three lectures here.

From Leadville I shall commence my homeward trip, and friends along the route desiring my services to lecture are requested to address as to date, etc., in care of E. A. Stevens, 498 West Madison street, Chicago.

JOHN R CHARLESWORTH.

Money.

In the article of Mr. Shumaker in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 14th, there is apparently an objection to a legal-tender act. This seems to me to arise from his not bringing forward the consideration which should be the basis of a legal-tender act. The object should be, not to force into circulation a currency which the people are unwilling to accept, but to facilitate the payment of indebtedness with money already accepted as the standard of the indebtedness. When a man incurs a debt, he agrees to pay so many dollars. It is the understanding that those dollars are coin. But if the debt is large, the transportation of the coin is cumbrous. A legal-tender note transfers the ownership of a specified amount of coin without necessitating the actual delivery of the silver or gold itself. When a man sells a farm and delivers it to the purchaser, he does not deliver the farm itself bodily, but the paper title which transfers the ownership of the farm. The treasury of the United States contains coined dollars; and a legal-tender act substantially provides, or ought to provide, that they shall belong to the holder of the notes constituting the paper title; just as a farm belongs to the person holding the deed. A debtor who givs a good paper title to the amount of coin that he owes, ought not to be burdened with transporting the coin bodily; and so long as the government faithfully redeems its notes with the specified amount of coin, subjecting the holder to as little inconvenience as possible, it is fair to presume that it benefits the payee as well as the party making the payment. It protects him from being obliged to carry away and take care of the bulky and weighty coin which the notes represent and may be converted into at his pleasure.

These suggestions are made, not as contradicting, but as supplementary to, those presented by Mr. Shumaker.

HENRY M. PARKHURST.

The Prize Manual.

A book with shadings—one not altogether bad, and one not wholly good. It is the result of a competition for the best prize essay on morality adapted to use in our public schools. The award of $1,000 was given to two writers, both of whom, if I mistake not, are ex-ministers. "The Laws of Daily Conduct," by Nicholas Paine Gilman, covering 149 pages, constitutes the first part of the work, and the second part, by Edward Payson Jackson, on "Character Building," embraces 230 pages. If these writers had kept their religion entirely out of sight the book would hav had more general and permanent value. But they could not. Mr. Gilman occupies large space in apologetical explanations for his attempting a work of this kind. He says in his preface that "The authors of both works are friends to religion," and Mr. Jackson repeats the avowal, declaring that "both writers"—himself and Mr. Gilman—"wish to be known as friends of religion." Now, why was it necessary for these gentlemen to make such confessions? Were they conscious of a despotic, intolerant public Christian sentiment which refuses to listen to moral doctrins? They had to make their bow to this Moloch, and I can see no reason for it unless it be that they did not hav moral backbone enough to say their say without cringing.

"But no one can properly say that the method here taken is either anti-religious or anti-theological." Of course not; but it is not difficult to see that it is anti-Freethought, anti-individual, and anti-moral in his implied higher morality.

He explains and supports his idea in the following quotation:

"Morality is here viewed as a practical art, which has of course a working theory that it is well to know; but it seems unadvisable to extend this theory, in the case of children in our public schools, by bringing in considerations which are distinctivly religious or theological. Religion may later in life become one of the greatest inspirations to good conduct, and rational theology may supplement a practical science of morals most happily" (italics mine).

Mr. Jackson begins his work by quoting "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's." And at another time he refers to "the eyes of an infallible judge." It is evident that these writers did not intend to lay down rules for "daily conduct" except for children—a kind of nursery morality, which is to be shed when the child becomes fully matured, for then "religion may become one of the greatest inspirations to good conduct, and rational theology may supplement a practical science of morals most happily." "A rational theology!" Is it possible that an author of a book on morality can speak of morality and a rational theology in the same breath?

Alas! he has tried to work his rational theology too intimately in his work on morals.

He begins laying the corner-stone of his moral superstructure in this fashion: "All our human life is lived under law." Then he proceeds to show that we must obey natural laws or suffer. Social conditions, too, are natural, and we must obey them or pay the penalty of violated law. The social laws are moral, or part of them are—"that there are rules for social welfare, and individual happiness, which, as men hav discovered by long experience, are entitled to be called laws of human conduct." The body of his work is given to the discussion of these laws, under the headings self-control, truthfulness, justice, kindness, honor, duty, etc. But after all he has said about morality he has given us no definition of it. In a general way he has repeated the consensus of the race respecting general terms relating to conduct, such as honor, truthfulness, duty, patriotism, etc. But this sort of generalizing is too vague. Mr. Gilman says that morality is progressiv—that is, it is changing—but where then do you find a code or standard of morality? In one instance he makes "right living" as synonymous with moral living, but there's the rub, what is right living? I can understand him as meaning the government of our lives according to the consensus of society—in other words, to regulate our lives according to public opinion. But we find public opinion the lowest standard of right that one can be governed by. It has indorsed the crimes of the past, and upholds those of to-day. "War, slavery, and religions are the fruits of public opinion."

Mr. Gilman is unable to show us any code of morals—he could not establish any standard of ethics—and why? I answer deliberately, because there is no code, no standard, to be set up. He acknowledges this in affirming that "the essential spirit of morality is self control by reason." This statement relieves him at one fell swoop of both his religion and his morality. "Self-control by reason" does the business.

The best that any human being can do is to liv a temperate and reasonable life. There is nothing higher than that. And every man is to be his own judge of what shall constitute temperance and rationality. And the guiding star to all his acts is their consequences—which will bring him the highest and noblest enjoyment?

When Mr. Gilman speaks of "self-control by reason" he is very near the kingdom. If he had only taken one step further, as thousands of good people in this and other countries hav done, and added to his "self-control by reason" what Emerson calls the iron string, "self-reliance," he would hav built upon solid rock. Substantially they do, but not ostensibly. They say, "Do not do this or that, because if you do you will suffer painful consequences." Yes, the consequences of our actions are their test. This is the guiding star of the human race. Reason says, "Look ahead, see what the consequences are to be, and act accordingly."

It must not be inferred from what I hav said that I regard the book as of little or no value, for I do not. I think every intelligent teacher will receive valuable suggestions from the work. For, notwithstanding Mr. Gilman's soothing remarks concerning the inspiring moral influence of religion in after-life, the gist of all he and Mr. Jackson hav to say shows that living up to the highest human maxims leaves nothing for religion to do. As the human virtues, as they are called, are exhausted under self-control by reason, with self-reliance attached.

W. S. BELL.

Sunday vs. Saturday.

Five men were arrested here for hauling brick on Sunday. The facts were that the railroad managers insisted on a carload of bricks being unloaded so they could use the car; and to save handling the bricks twice the men hauled the loads from the car to the building works and passed right before the door of a meeting-house. This, the pious folks said, "disturbed them," and, under a statute forbidding labor on Sunday, the arrests were made. But look at it! The law applies to all persons or corporations. Yet no one dreams of arresting the railroad managers, although freight-trains pass screaming by every ten or fifteen minutes. And here are the Saturday observers, they are never disturbed, oh, no! though all the Sunday worshipers keep up a perfect riot of labor and noise on Saturday.

A great many well-meaning people, the mass in fact, deem it all right to arrest any person—except railway managers—in case the Sunday observers complain that they were disturbed or wounded in their pious feelings by any labor done on Sunday. If anyone should argue for the arrest of the Sunday observers for working on Saturday so as to disturb Sabbatarians how amazed they would be! What an educator of our people is such a statute! It teaches them that the minority hav no rights. I hav lived where there were hundreds of Saturday observers. In passing through the streets occupied by them all was quiet, every business door of theirs closed, their meeting-houses full of worshipers. Right in their midst were a few Sunday observers who seemed to delight in making more noise than usual or necessary in their business and enjoyments. No law was violated by them. But if next day the others had dared to make similar noises, the law was violated, and they who made the noise liable to heavy fine and imprisonment. Here the minority in a large community, here even one person out of many thousands, it may be, has a glorious privilege in our glorious country. He can insult, annoy, outrage the feelings and prejudices of the thousands with impunity, whereas let them dare to follow his example and they are made criminals of.

Such statutes are atrocious. The sooner the whole system of Sunday observance by law and church property exemption from tax and all belonging to it is annihilated the better.

To Our Subscribers.

We are in sore need of the amounts due on subscriptions and ask everyone who owes us money to be especially prompt in sending it.

This also is the time of year when a great many subscriptions expire, and an immediate renewal will be a favor to us.

Owing probably to the elections and the labor incident to gathering and marketing the great harvests our friends hav neglected to forward what is due us, and we are consequently compelled to somewhat urgently remind them of their remissness. As Mr. Bennett used to say under these circumstances, Friends, let us hear from you.

To the Friends and Subscribers of Freethought.

I sincerely hope that all who hav supported Freethought in the past will aid the work to which it has been devoted by becoming subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER. THE TRUTH SEEKER will carry on the work, but it needs your coöperation. It is a means by which I can reach you and push on the Pacific coast labors. Especially I ask those in arrears to pay what is now due to THE TRUTH SEEKER and place their names upon its list as cordial supporters for the future. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

A Great Book.

Our Bible Picture Book will contain about four hundred pages, one-half of which will be full-page pictures and one-half reading matter, relating to stories which the pictures illustrate. The text will lead to a full understanding of the tale, even as the artist's work illustrates it with an electric searchlight brilliance unsurpassed by the torch of the golden goddess Diana on the Garden tower. Young people can learn more about the Old Testament and its heroes by reading this book than by reading the Old Testament itself. It is much more easily comprehended, and is written in more chaste language.

There will be twenty-six chapters in the book, twelv of which are completed, as follows:

I. Adventures of Adam.
II. The Origin of the Young Men's Christian Association.
III. Sustaining a Theory.
IV. Some Giants.
V. The Adventures and Work of Noah.
VI. A Hunting Anecdote.
VII. Abraham, Christ's Great Ancestor.
VIII. A Queer Family.
IX. Isaac and His "Sister."
X. One of Twins.
XI. Jacob and Esau.
XII. Joseph, the Man of Dreams.

The book will afford many a hearty laugh, while we hav not forgotten to make it a solid attack upon the superstition which can venerate and believe the tales told in the Old Testament. So far as it goes it shows that book in its true colors, though of course we hav omitted the Old Testament obscenity in order to make our work one admissible in all families and readable by all ages and sexes.

The price of our work is $1. Orders will be cheerfully booked now and filled as soon as the work comes from the press.

Subscribers.

The holidays are almost here. Are you ready for them? A gift that would prove acceptable to any Liberal friend, and at the same time keep you in constant remembrance during the year, would be a year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Your own renewal and the new subscription will cost only $5 00.

Missionaries in China.

It is pretty generally thought that the missionaries to the heathen are not always the self-sacrificing individuals they profess to be, and that their mission is in itself as much a fraud as they are humbugs, and as superfluous as the preachers are useless. This of course is denied by the missionaries and their superiors who make money by sending them out, but it is nevertheless fast becoming a settled belief.

In the Hongkong Telegraph of August 15th and 24th there is correspondence which throws some light on this subject, pro and con, and the pro is nearly as convincing against the missionary system as the con. It was begun by a missionary who evidently desired to scold the Europeans residing in China as well as to explain why he did not make more converts. Unconsciously, too, he shows the absurdity of the system by alleging that the heathen are better anyway than the Europeans (except the preachers, of course); but it does not seem to hav occurred to him that if he wrote the truth he should to be consistent and honest, at once pack his trunk and buy a ticket to his hailing port. His letter shows him to be a believer in hell for all his critics, and his excuses are an unerring index to that of which he is accused. He says to the editor of the Telegraph:

"SIR: I am a missionary and glory in my profession. I am but one of a phalanx of two hundred who hav given up home, ambition, preferment, social pleasures, dear associations, kith and kin to spread the light in the darkness and to bring salvation to the four hundred million Chinese, who unless they are regenerated will be lost to all eternity.

"We are opposed in our labors by the activ antagonism of the idolators, and much more by wicked and godless Europeans calling themselvs Christians but leading lives which are an endless delight to every child of hell.

"I believe in preserving a dignified silence under all ordinary provocation. But in the past four weeks, a number of newspapers, especially those in the north, hav been gratifying their love of sin by opening as uncalled-for, unjust, mendacious, and malicious a war as it has ever fallen to the lot of Christian ladies and gentlemen, volunteers in the Lord's army, to be compelled to endure.

"As the Telegraph has not joined in the mad attack of blasphemous Infidels and moral lepers upon the truest and noblest souls that Christendom has ever dispatched into the lands of spiritual darkness, I write these lines, hoping that you will giv them space, so as to show the public at large that the missionaries are not to be insulted with impunity, and that the stench of the sins of the European colony in China has risen up into the nostrils of every decent, God-fearing man, whose eyes and ears are open to what goes on around him and especially to the flagitious and infamous lives of those who belong to our own race and civilization.

"In the first place, these mendacious miscreants accuse us of having a good time in China, of playing tennis, dominoes, checkers, chess, backgammon, tenpins, and other innocent games, of living well, eating, drinking, and dressing like themselvs, of taking a vacation in the sultry months and of resorting to beautiful mountains and lovely seashores wherein to spend our leisure, thereby deceiving and defrauding our societies at home. We do indulge in the harmless and healthful pleasures named and we hav the right so to do. A missionary is a human being with human wants. Good clothes, a fine house, good cooking, pleasant reading, and wholesome recreation are as necessary to him as to anyone else. 'The laborer is worthy of his hire,' and he to his salary and its concomitants. A man cannot work all the time. At the furthest in this hot climate if he toils four hours per diem he is doing very well, and becomes entitled to the other twenty for rest and restful amusement. Nor is there fraud or deceit about the matter. Our societies are cognizant of all the facts I hav mentioned and sustain us in every regard. We do not come to China as martyrs or the leaders of a forlorn hope, but as workers in the vineyard, and to work well and successfully demands all that has been said above."

After this spirited defense, which is a complete admission of all alleged against him, he proceeds to the aggressiv, beginning with the admission of that which is also claimed by the opponents of the system, viz.: that it does not accomplish results in proportion to the money and effort spent upon it. He says:

"In the second place, we are not successful as we wish to be and as we would be if we were supported here by the people of our own race. The curse of the foreign missions in China is the foreigner. Of every ten converts we make from idolatry to Protestantism, nine are dragged back to their old pagan wallow or to their deeper depths of Atheism, Materialism and sensualism. Our hands are tied and our voices stifled by the children of Belial of our own race. Nearly every European here is wickeder than a Chinaman, especially as he has the light, while the latter has not. Nearly every single European and American has his concubine, mistress, or female slave, the same as the bestial mandarins. Nearly every European drinks to excess and incites the Chinese to the same vice—a hideous vice I am glad to say that is almost unknown to the poor heathen. Nearly every European is cruel, callous, and brutal to his Chinese inferiors and shows more clearly than words can ever do that his Christianity is a sham and a fraud. Nearly every European is a hypocrit and goes to church hot from the bed of sin and damnation. And worst of all nearly every European sneers at us missionaries and makes us laughing-stocks for their own base minds and for their heathen friends, companions, employees, and household servants. I know of so-called gentlemen who are really blasphemous blackguards, who habitually refer to our holy calling as 'Jesus-pigeon' and to the hideous mockery of Buddhism as 'Joss-pigeon,' as if the two were the same. They take their Moabitish women into their homes, but never invite us, our wives, and our daughters into their parlors nor show us the scantiest courtesy. Last week in a Shanghai paper they capped the climax by insinuating that when our noble inland apostles, male and female, when traveling in the north, were compelled to sleep together in wagons or beds, they were doing what they ought not to do. A mind that could frame such a thought is gangrened and rotten to the core. It makes my blood boil to see how we suffer and endure at the hands of our fellow-countrymen. Oh that the good people at home could know that the worst heathen, the wickedest idolators, the nastiest sensualists, the vilest scoffers, and the most sinful wretches in the East were not the poor benighted Chinese but their own countrymen. But let me warn them now and here that retribution will come in this life and in the next and that for them is the hottest place in hell and a hapless and hopeless old age on earth.

"Yours, etc., C. D.

"Hongkong, 14th August, 1891."

THE TRUTH SEEKER is doing its best to let the good people at home know that the Chinamen are not the ones who need conversion to honesty and morality, but the Christians themselvs. And if these charges against the Europeans and Americans in China—church-members, as "C. D." claims—are true he should cease his efforts among the heathen and attack the Christians—urge them to cease drinking and to giv up their concubines.

But, notwithstanding we hav the word of a preacher for it, we do not believe that all the Europeans and Americans in China are immoral. C. D. says those who attend church do so hot from the bed of sin and damnation. This we do not doubt, as church-members are apt to be a little wild. But the other Americans and Europeans are, as we gather from several replies to this excited letter, pretty decent sort of folks even if they do not believe in missionaries. In the Telegraph of the 24th of August three correspondents write in response to C. D., and one of them touches upon this subject, saying:

"There is not the slightest doubt but what a few foreigners in China do set the nativs a bad example, but that every one does so, and that nearly every single European or American keeps a concubine, mistress, or slave, is a deliberate falsehood, and is clear and convincing proof that the experience of C. D. in Chinese treaty ports is most limited."

On the subject of missionaries in general in their relations to the foreigners in China engaged in mercantil pursuits he says:

"No one for a moment wishes to deprive the missionaries of the wants of human life; but foreigners who hav been years in China cannot help expressing themselvs in the way 'C. D.' complains of, and which they would not do were it not for the missionary people themselvs, who go home and stand up in assemblies and make false statements of how badly they hav to liv, what poor food they are obliged to exist on, etc., etc., and wind up by asking for the usual subscription.

"People at home, who never go abroad, do not know that when they are thinking of half-starved missionaries, wandering about and living in mud hovels, many are in reality enjoying the best things of this life, living on first-class food, under punkahs, lying back in long chairs, quaffing cool drinks, or enjoying a trip up-country in a well-furnished house-boat, while the mercantil community are earning a living by the sweat of their brow.

"There are a lot of missionaries, and I hav had the pleasure of meeting several, who work and toil at all hours and seasons, who honestly, earnestly, and quietly do what they came out for.

"'C. D.' claims that foreign are the curse of missi s in China; then why does the m nary pester the of every foreigner for the almighty d ,and three time at of four for some school where nativ legitimate and il. itimate children are being fed, clothed, and educated, whose parents are in all probability having a good time in an opium den, or worse. The foreigner nearly always stumps up, although if he should happen to hav children of his own he is compelled to run into debt or deprive himself of the necessaries of life to send them home to school, because the missionary body will not undertake to teach foreign children. A foreigner in China, unless he has a good income, has to think seriously of getting married and running the risk of throwing a family on the world, without means of subsistence; not so the missionary, who gets a premium annually for every child his family happens to be blessed with.

"'C. D.' probably never heard of the action of a few of his sort in connection with the Seamen's Club at Amoy.

"That the Amoy missionaries refused to hold services in the chapel on Sundays, because they did not come out to preach to foreigners, and that divine service was held in the Amoy Masonic Hall without their assistance.

"In Newchang they refused to read the burial service over a young man who died suddenly because he had never attended church, and yet they will tell one that the burial service is read more for the benefit of those standing round the grave than for the body about to be committed to earth.

"In a part not a thousand miles from Hongkong a well-known missionary many years ago owned a considerable number of Chinese houses, some of which were known brothels, from which he collected rents, and at times personally. The gentleman has gone to his long home years ago, and it is to be hoped he is paying back the rent another way."

Another correspondent, calling himself "a good Presbyterian," residing in Tamsui, supplements this with some facts known to him. He writes to the editor of the Telegraph:

"SIR: I don't quite agree with your correspondent, who calls missionaries 'frauds.' They are, simply, humbugs. As old Barnum said, 'the public love to be humbugged, and the churches at home are willing to pay well for fairy stories from the East.' Here is one of the best of them: A missionary in this place, who had not had any success, hit upon an original idea and invited all the Chinese in his district to a 'free lunch.' When the average Mongolian read the placards, which promised 'free chow, free beer, free baccy, free gin, and free music,' he wouldn't at first believe his eyes; but when he was convinced that there was a free collation of some sort, he crowded the missionary's yamen and even packed the streets outside. The missionary, delighted with results, thus transmitted the fact to the people at home: 'Glory to God; fifteen thousand heathens throw down their idols and embrace the cross of Christ; hallelujah. Send me more money!' And the money came and has been coming ever since. How many converts were made by the free chow and free booze I know not. The congregation was no larger the day after the miracle than it was the day before. It is not much larger to-day, and consists, as usual, of the coolies of the missionaries and Europeans, with a handful of intelligent Chinese who want to learn English. The missionary who has it in charge, is a nice man and earns his salary, but he always strikes me as a humbug, since his miraculous conversion of the fifteen thousand heathen."

"A good Presbyterian," it seems to us, draws too fine a distinction between a fraud and a humbug. The missionary is both. He humbugged the nativs and he defrauded his supporters. But the good Presbyterian was no doubt more inclined to consider missionaries frauds after reading "A Shanghai Merchant's" letter in the same paper in which his own appeared, which ran thus:

"I hav been deeply interested in the correspondence about our friends of the foreign missions, and desire to add my mite to the discussion. I belong to Shanghai, where as you know we hav had some trouble of late. The moment the rumor came that there was danger, the missionaries made a masterly retreat to our city. Before the troubles were over, they had drawn up claims for indemnity, and filed them in some instances with their consuls. Nearly all were outrageously extortionate, and a few were equivalent to highway robbery, pure and simple. Here is a sample, and one which was filed with General Jones, of Chinkiang:

Fare of myself, wife, child, amah, and servant, Chinkiang to Shanghai and return (It is really $80.)	$ 195
Six weeks' board in Shanghai for ditto (They were stopping with another missionary.)	720
Salary of myself and wife, for us to account for to our Mission Society	600
Incidentals and extras	175
Value of property left behind, probably all destroyed.	3 000
Injury to property taken with us	550
Damage done to our gospel work	600
Shock to my wife's feelings (We are willing to leave this amount to your discretion.)	5,000
Shock to my nerves (same as above)	5,000
Damage to our amah	75
	$15,915

Please collect this as soon as possible.

"Is there a business man in Hongkong, who could equal, much less surpass the above for mild effrontery?"

The editor of the Telegraph joins in with this comment: "We know General Jones, and it is a privilege we highly appreciate; but if he doesn't 'go for' this particular missionary fiend we shall know him no more."

We commend this correspondence, the missionary's letter as well as the replies, to the careful attention of everyone who pays a dollar into any church fund for the conversion of the heathen. And we also commend this thought to them: If the missionary's statements are true the heathen are better than the Christians, and therefore the heathen should be left to their own religion and the Christians labored with. If the opponents of the missionary are right—of which there appears no reasonable doubt—then the system breeds fraud and humbug, and should be done away with. And the way to do away with it is to refuse to giv a cent to missionary funds. Then the preachers will come tumbling home, perhaps to earn an honest living.

Work With Congressmen.

The churches hav never been so united upon one subject, except perhaps their detestation of and cruelty to heretics, as they are upon the effort to close the World's Fair on Sunday. The reason for this is plain enough. Sunday is the priests' day; they own it, and on it own the people. It is the St. Andrew's day of the week, when they hold the people up and collect their tithes. Without Sunday they would hav little influence in the community, and when the day goes they know, as Parker Pillsbury says, that with it will go their reverend and holy selvs.

The latest move of the Sabbatarians is a petition addressed to Congress, asking that body to attach to a national appropriation of five millions for the Fair a condition that the show shall not be open on Sundays. The Sabbatarians regard this as necessary, because they believe it to be the intention of the commissioners to wait until the Fair is about to begin and then to decide to open it on Sundays. This the Sabbatarians think would be "one of the direst calamities that could befall our country."

Congress will meet on the 7th of next month, and the work by the Sabbatarians upon the members will begin at once. The Liberals should also begin their work. Every Freethinker in the country, every Liberal-minded man, should write to his Congressman and urge that official to vote against any Sunday-closing condition going with any appropriation, and for the Fair to be opened on Sundays. Write him a letter like this:

".....1891.

"HON....., MEMBER OF CONGRESS FOR THE DISTRICT OF .....:

"Dear Sir: As one of your constituents I desire to call your attention to a matter of great importance.

"I understand that the American Sabbath Union—an organization working for the revival of a Puritan Sunday observance—has circulated petitions asking your honorable body to attach to any appropriation for the World's Fair to be held in Chicago in 1893 a condition that such Fair shall be kept closed on Sunday.

"I desire to protest against this condition being attached to any appropriation, and to say that if any condition at all is attached it shall be that the Fair is kept OPEN on every Sunday of its continuance. And I respectfully ask you to vote to open the Fair on Sundays if that question shall come before Congress in any shape. And I ask this for these reasons, which are given in a petition to the local directory and national commission, which petition has been signed by thousands of citizens and will be sent to the Fair authorities:

"1. That the American principle of separation of church and state may be maintained.

"2. That public morality may be subserved by providing a substitute for the immoral places to which men may resort when no moral amusements are available.

"3. As a matter of justice to the people of Chicago who hav given of their means to make the Fair possible, tens of thousands of whom can visit the Fair only on a general holiday; and as a matter of justice also to the visitors to the Fair, whose time or means may be limited, and who certainly are entitled to great consideration at your hands.

"4 For the public good. The opening of the Fair on Sunday will be for the benefit not only of Chicago, but of the whole country. The rights of no one are infringed, the happiness of no one disturbed. Those who wish to attend can do so; those who do not can otherwise spend the day. This is a solely humanitarian question, a question of human relations and human welfare, and therefore the only standard by which you can decide is that of the public welfare.

"5. It will benefit the Fair, attracting a much larger attendance, interesting more people in it, and increasing its receipts.

"6. To the objection that Sunday opening of the Fair will destroy the day as a rest-day, we affirm that the tendency would be exactly the opposit. The more beautiful you make Sunday, the more attractiv, the more noble and varied in its pleasures and instructions, the more difficult it will be to change its character, the less danger there is that employers will ever hav the power to transfer it from its present position to the days of toil. With choice of Sunday occupation restricted to attending church or visiting a saloon, the average workingman would choose to keep on laboring.

"7. Finally: Opening the World's Fair on Sunday will harm no one but the keepers of immoral places, while it will benefit the Fair itself, the people of Chicago, and the visitors to the Fair, thereby conducing to municipal prosperity, individual education, public morality, and the development and good of the whole country.

"Hoping that these reasons will hav weight with you for good, and that you will ever be found on the side of freedom, I remain, Yours truly, —— ——"

This letter can be copied either as it is or with such modifications as suggest themselvs to individual writers, or it can be cut out, the blanks filled out, and sent to Congressmen, or send a few stamps and we will return copies printed on note paper all ready for filling out and mailing. The main point is to hav about one hundred sent to every member of Congress. Such a number would cause him to think.

This work is extremely necessary, for all the religious journals and religious fanatics hav joined hands in this matter of closing the Fair, and some of the national commissioners hav committed themselvs in favor of Sabbatarianism. Unfortunately, too, the women can be used by the clergy and their influence is on the wrong side. One of the national commissioners has approved a scheme to "erect a mammoth gospel-tent in Jackson park for the glory of God, and secure all public audience rooms in Chicago for the use on the Lord's day during the World's Fair, of the celebrated preachers and singers who will gather there from our own and other lands!" The lady who invented this scheme thinks that "as citizens of a country acknowledging God in its Constitution, we ought to make the Lord's day a prominent and beautiful feature of the World's Fair," and that by the mammoth tent scheme the "First Day would assume its proper rank and function at the Columbian Exposition, and the question of closing the Fair on that day would settle itself at once." She is indorsed by Charles H. Richmond, one of the commissioners for Michigan, though whether he indorses the statement that our country acknowledges God in its Constitution cannot be inferred from his statement of approval. At any rate it is evident that he will vote for Sunday closing, and there may be more, and probably are, just like him.

Let everyone take an activ personal interest in this matter, counteracting the meddlesomeness of the fanatics, and it is possible, and even probable, that the Fair will be open Sundays.

A Christmas or New Year's Present.

The "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book" in cloth binding ($2 50) is one of the best Christmas or New Year's presents a Liberal can make to a friend. Christmas is a pagan festival and New Year's is only a mark of time, but the Text-Book is a thing of beauty and a joy forever, and will help to rationalize the festival and make your friend forget the flight of years.

The Original Liar Took It Back.

Some years ago some preacher who tells his Sunday-school scholars not to bear false witness started the story that Colonel Ingersoll had taken up the profession of prophet, and predicted that within ten years there would be more theaters than churches.

Recently a minister down in Texas repeated the story, and when called to account persisted in maintaining its truth. Mr. B. C. Murray, of the Denison Sunday Gazetteer, who takes charge of the clerical liars about Infidels in that section of the country, referred the matter to this office for proof that the minister was wrong, and we referred the matter to headquarters. Colonel Ingersoll writes us:

"NEW YORK, Nov. 18, 1891.

"E. M. MACDONALD—My Dear Friend: Of course I never said 'that in ten years there would be more theaters than churches.' I believe that the preacher who first started this story has taken it back.

"It never occurred to me that in so short a period as ten years there would be more theaters than churches. I know that civilization is a slow process, and that it takes time to develop the minds and tastes of the people. Very little can be done in ten years. Yours always,

"R. G. INGERSOLL."

That ought to satisfy the preachers who hav been circulating the story. It remains to be seen, however, whether they will hav honesty enough to acknowledge their error.

We Reply, the Foremost Tax Reform is to Tax Churches.

NEW YORK, Aug. 29, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: This association has sent you three issues of its broadside sheets, containing the principal comments on our platform, taken from over two hundred and fifty papers in this state.

I think that the question of personal property taxation will be an issue in the coming state campaign. It therefore behooves our public educators to post their constituencies on the subject. So far we hav not seen anything from your pen. What this association desires is discussion with or without reference to ourselvs. Could you not call attention to our work by telling your readers what we want to do? We would esteem it a great favor if you would. Will you please send us a copy of your paper when it contains anything relating to such matter? We would be glad to furnish you matter on the subject if desired.

Yours truly, BOLTON HALL,
Secretary New York Tax Reform Association.

Infidels, Veteran and Tenderfoot.

ST. ANSGAR, IA., NOV. 7, 8 P. M. 291.

MR. EDITOR: A local committee of fifteen Liberals and elastic orthodox secured three lectures by W. S. Bell, and almost all came out each with his own conception of liberty and Freethought, while a few stayed at home, taking care of their policy Gods, and a great number of outsiders were busy instructing their God who said, Try all things and hold fast to that which is good. If Mr. Bell could hav brought with him a carved image expressing the conceptions of each Liberal and orthodox he would hav had a valuable collection for some progressiv museum. Some of us expected stronger doses, while others were thrown into spasmodic convulsions over the mild emulsion administered—but, then, the curdled milk of orthodoxy is still in our stomachs. A number of TRUTH SEEKERS hav been left with us, and a few of Mr. Bell's "Handbooks of Freethought," and we will wait for results. Yours for Liberty, A J. CLAUSEN.

Won't Wonder at the Georgia Wonder.

MILES CITY, MONT., Nov. 4, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Permit me a few words which I believe are due and will not be considered inappropriate after reading the communications relating to the Georgia Wonder in the columns of your valuable paper. It is very plain that the matter of the Georgia Wonder has been settled beyond a doubt by Mr. W. P. Butler, of Aberdeen, S. D, to whom I sent the papers containing the articles mentioned in his communication in THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 31st, and to whom all lovers of truth and investigation are indebted for the facts that hav been presented by him, also to whom Mr. J. L. Tompkins is indebted for the information obtained on that subject. It has been well said, "Consistency, thou art a jewel," and it seems to me as though Mr. Tompkins should profit thereby, for he desired a "problem solved" and when some one makes an effort to obtain information in that direction he fails to appreciate its intrinsic worth, but at once proceeds to "roast" said parties without cause except for obtaining information that should be considered of value. I beg leave to inform Mr. Tompkins that reason will convince me of the truth a great deal quicker than anything else that I know of and that my part in the controversy was actuated solely by an honest motiv while seeking for the truth. In view of the fact that superstition has held liberty in bondage for ages let us welcome every effort made to overthrow and eradicate its liberty-destroying influence. With that end in view let the truth be made known, which is only obtained through investigation and reason.

C. B. WEBST.

This Closes the Discussion.

LAKE CITY, IA., NOV. 13, 291.

MR. EDITOR: Will you be so kind as to grant me a little space in THE TRUTH SEEKER to say a few words in my own vindication from charges made by Mr. W. P. Butler in THE TRUTH SEEKER of October 31st? In his letter he makes rash charges against myself, all, I think, from a mistaken understanding of my letter defending Mrs. Abbott.

My first letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER was written with a true desire to find out what Mrs. Abbott was, but never believing for one moment that she possessed any supernatural power. I am not built that way. My second letter was not written until I had a clipping sent to me, taken from a Manitoba paper, contradicting Mr. Butler's statements in regard to his exposure of the Georgia Magnet. That statement was signed by four persons, I think, and appeared to be just as honestly done as did Mr. Butler's, and why he should deny it, unless he did not understand my letter, is more than I can tell. I am sure his charges made are beneath the dignity of a gentleman in any other light. I was requested to return the article or clipping taken from the Manitoba paper to the gentleman sending it to me, or I would gladly send it to THE TRUTH SEEKER for publication. But the report was seen here by those having read of Mr. Butler's exposé in the Abbott case, and as a matter of course people here are yet in doubt, and always will be unless Mr. Butler should take the back track of Mrs. Abbott and perform the great feats that she did, and explain just how they are done, and in that case he will convince a doubting people and make a nice little fortune for himself—a thing I hav no doubt he much desires. I was talking with Mr. Remsburg. He thinks the lady in the Chicago museum not the same as the Georgia Magnet, and says Mr. Bell saw her (the Georgia Magnet) and considered her a perfect phenomenon. Is it possible such men can be so easily deceived? No, no, it will not do. There is something wrong in some place. And Mr. Butler must excuse us if we cannot accept his entire statement as fact. When he says he can do all that Mrs. Emma Abbott could do, it is asking too much to expect a credulous people to believe it. If Mr. Butler will come to the capital of our state and do all he says he can, I will go one hundred miles to see the performance, and if he is successful and fills the bill here for one week as well as did our Emma Abbott he will hav made a nice little fortune, and I will be out my traveling expenses, and pay Mr. Butler's board bill for the week. There is none more anxious than I to know what Emma Abbott really is. To learn that is all the interest I hav in her case. This will be my last letter as regards this case, and others younger than I can afford to wait coming events. I desire truth, and truth only, as found in nature; no supernatural power in mine if you please. Respectfully, J. L. TOMPKINS.

MR. EDITOR: I sent and got two of your catalogs and gave them to parties. I wish I could do something for you, but the illiberal Liberals, as Green calls them, are very numerous here. My wife joins with me in kind regards and well wishes to you and the TRUTH SEEKER family. I inclose a clipping from the Kalamazoo Gazette.

Yours for liberty, E. H. GAULT.

Rev. Caroline J. Bartlett ably discussed the question of opening on Sundays the World's Fair at the Unitarian church Sunday evening. The question, being one of national interest, attracted a large audience to the little brown church. Miss Bartlett spoke of the countless committees delegated to wait upon the World's Fair managers, with resolutions opposing the Sunday opening, and complimented them for their activity. The opposition base their argument on the scripture which cites to keep the Sabbath holy. If this were lived up to, street cars, carriages, etc., would not be seen upon the streets, and men would do no labor whatever. Coming again to the question of the World's Fair, Miss Bartlett stated that it was upon religious grounds that some people wanted the Fair closed on Sunday. It is stated that the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath. But our question of to-day concerns not the Jewish Sabbath but the Christian Sabbath. Sunday is never a fast day in the Catholic or Episcopal church. We find nothing in the New Testament interdicting work on the Lord's day. Not until the time of Puritanism were innocent games on Sunday forbidden. How came the orthodox ideas of Sunday? We hav the history of a man being stoned to death for picking up sticks on Sunday.

Miss Bartlett believed in physical and mental rest on Sunday. If Adventists keep Saturday, why then Sunday? In regard to the question of keeping the Fair open on Sunday, 1893, it seems to be a question of human good on human grounds. In Chicago during that summer there will be two hundred thousand transient population. When Saturday night comes, from factory and office there will many more come to increase the congregation in that city. What is to be done with them? They cannot go to church all day. If a man kept a saloon, a dance-house, or a brothel, he would be willing to hav the World's Fair closed on Sunday.

It is the brawn, the bone, and the red blood that cannot go. As the matter now stands the people go out to Jackson park and Washington park on Sundays. They take their lunches and children and stay all day. These are the lungs of the city. We, forsooth, because we want an Exposition, would take away their one place of recreation, so that they could not hav it from now on and so they could not hav it in 1893. It would require a less number of employees to keep this multitude in order if they are permitted to enter the Exposition than if they are shut out to turn themselvs into a mob. Why not invite the ministers to hav a meeting on Sunday and hav the best music? Some say that to hav the World's Fair open on Sunday would excite the people and unfit them for work next day. One minister would rather hav the Blue Laws return than to hav the Exposition on Sunday. Is there not some prejudice in this? Can a picture or statue, which enlightens on six days of the week, do harm on Sunday? Rest is a new sight to see, a new thought to think. The masses will never believe in God until he is revealed to them. The church which does this for the poor is the church of the future. We cannot by petition or statute make a Christian.

Trumpet-Call Against Our Would-be Tyrants.

THREE RIVERS, MICH., Nov., 1891.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: To each and everyone who may hav, or who should hav, the best well-being of our great and grand republic in view, it is to you I wish to talk and ask a few questions of seeming importance. I hear ominous sounds in the murky atmosphere of Christian priestcraft and fanatical church communities, portentous of danger to the true commonwealth of these our United States of America. Indeed, the waters of peace are likely to be needlessly troubled by a few over-zealous, cranky societies about the propriety, or rather impropriety, as I should say, of thrusting their personal God into the Constitution of our nation, which would simply be a stepping-stone to a detestable union of church and state. These hot-headed zealots or priests are striving to make a willing catspaw of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union and the Young Men's Christian Association, re-creating or bringing to life the old musty, unreasonable Sunday Blue laws that were promulgated by early Connecticut Puritan Christians—an ignorant set of fanatics, who professed to believe they were doing God service by whipping, drowning, fining, and hanging so-called witches and Sunday trespassers, accused of some fancied wrong. I ask, were such diabolical proceedings done in order to scare honest, well-meaning people to take refuge in the church of those dreadful times, when misguided ministers of a questionable gospel or religion preached hell-fire and damnation to a persecuted people, whose daily lives were much better than those of their priestly tormentors? Is it possible that even now we hav a national president, a postmaster-general, and many Congressmen who are willing to overlook the awful persecutions, too horrible to name, when church and state were united in many of the old nations beyond the briny ocean? Do they think to win a crown of glory by working to please themselvs and a few millions of professed Christians, by gladly listening to the clandestin requests thereof to get laws enacted for the fining and punishing of innocent people, whose business employment is such that Sunday is the only time they can hav for a little harmless outlet and needful recreation among the rural fields, forests, groves, and all Dame Nature's beckoning joys! Some Christian fanatics presume to call this a Christian nation! Oh, shades of Parnassus! how dishonest and futil the claim! Only think of it—there are at most, according to our late census, only about 16,000,000 church-going Christian communicants of all denominations, and half of that number at least are believed to be such only by name or profession, the other half being infidel to their profession, thus showing the worst kind of infidelity, and reducing the abovesaid number who may be of the better class of Christians down to 8,000,000 out of the 63,000,000 inhabitants of our nation, the most progressiv and truly the banner nation of the whole world. Yet, as before noted, the comparativly small handful of Christians hav the audacity to claim a right to rule God into the national Constitution, over the shoulders of our wise forefathers, who, foreseeing the imminent danger of placing God therein, left him out on purpose, and wisely did they so. Praised be their honorable names forever and ever.

Now only 16,000,000 Christians, good, bad, and indifferent, are set off against the vast number of 47,000,000 non-professors, and yet the few hav the effrontery and brass to claim this to be a Christian nation, and clamor for a God in the Constitution, and for union of church and state; also for Puritan Sunday laws, and Comstockish stool-pigeon arrests, and persecuting fines for what they are pleased to term obscene literature—literature that is white compared to a vast amount of Bible obscenity.

Now, who will gainsay the truth of the foregoing open letter? "I pause for a reply," as friend Piper would say.

E. D. BLAKEMAN.

From the Seat of Our Coming Sunday Conflict.

CHICAGO, ILL., Nov. 11, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: In accordance with the request of THE TRUTH SEEKER I sent to Secretary Butterworth a copy of the inclosed protest against closing the World's Fair on Sunday. I am the author of the communication.

The Catholics hav been greatly disturbed by Mr. Butterworth's utterance touching the madonnas and the crucifixions. The power of the Catholics is gone so far as having any influence that would cause the removal of an important officer like Mr. Butterworth. If he should be removed the Chicago Liberals would make Rome howl. I called on Mr. Butterworth to-day and he was not in the least disturbed. S. ROBERTS.

QUESTIONS FOR MR. BLANCHARD.

In Monday morning's issue of the Daily News the Rev. Mr. Blanchard is reported to hav said in the meeting held at Grace Methodist Episcopal church Sunday evening, under the auspices of the American Sabbath Union, that "the World's Fair should not be open on the Sabbath, because the law of God forbids work on that day."

I wish to know if Mr. Blanchard can refer to any passage in the Bible which prohibits work on the first day of the week (Sunday)? I also wish to know by whose authority and when the first day of the week was substituted for the seventh day? Furthermore, I would like to know if he or any other preacher can point to any passage uttered by Christ which commands that any particular day was holier than any other day. When Jesus was accused by the Pharisees of breaking the Sabbath he replied that the son of man (not the son of God) was even lord of the Sabbath. I ask the Pharisees of to-day if the sons of men (the people) are not also lords of the Sabbath in this enlightened day. The orthodox ministers, it seems to me, are very much alarmed over what they term the desecration of their Sunday. They claim that it is in the interest of the laboring men that they are demanding the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday.

How is it, I ask, that the laboring men are not making any move in the same direction? On the contrary, the laboring people, at least the great majority of them, are opposed to the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday. The reason is plain enough. The working people hav only one day (Sunday) in the week which they can afford to spend to attend the Fair, whereas the ministers hav six days at their command. These preachers and their supporters are exceedingly anxious concerning the holy observance of Sunday. How many of them eat cold meals on that holy day? Perhaps they all do. If they do they do not publish it. Are not the servants of these modern Pharisees at work most of the day preparing as good meals on that day as on any other day?

How many pious church-members ride in their carriages driven by liveried servants on the day when Mr. Blanchard says "God forbids work," besides the thousands who ride in the street and steam cars? If these preachers and their followers sincerely believe that the work done in the running of carriages, street and steam cars is prohibited by God, why in the name of religion and common sense do they patronize them? Why do not these preachers preach in favor of eating cold meals and using their own locomotion on Sunday, thereby giving the thousands of people who are now deprived of the rest they ought to hav time to attend divine services if they wish?

I am a workingman myself. I hav also children who hav to work six days each week. Sunday is the only day we can afford to spend, and we hope to be able to make good use of it during the holding of the World's Fair; but if the preachers could hav their way myself and children as well as millions of others would be deprived of the opportunity of enjoying the grandest exhibition of the works of nature and man the world has ever seen. I hav faith in the good sense of the American people and I believe the World's Fair directors will exercise their good judgment to that extent as to extend the opportunity to all the people to visit or not visit the World's Fair every day of the week during its continuance.

The people of the United States of America are the lords of even the Sabbath day and the voice of the people is the voice of God. If the preachers of Chicago during the Fair will preach good common-sense sermons, something after the style of Swing and Thomas, I will guarantee that their churches will not be able to hold the people that will want to hear them. In conclusion I ask Mr. Blanchard and his fellow-preachers to giv us a rest on the World's Fair Sunday-closing business and giv us instead the kind of mental food that will enable us to better the environments and condition of the people at large. REGNANT POPULI.

The Comparativ Morals of Christians and Ingersollians.

YPSILANTI, Oct. 10, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Finding my subscription nearly out, and myself still on deck, I thought best to renew, as the paper is always a welcome visitor, helping me to while away what would otherwise be many a sad hour. I am in want of several more of your publications, but find myself, like many of your subscribers, not only old but in limited circumstances, making it necessary to deny myself the pleasure they would afford. Nevertheless, we old fellows hav one consolation, viz., "Blessed are the poor, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven."

I inclose a slip cut from the Ypsilantian, stating the views of the reverend doctor as to what this town would be obliged to do in case it should adopt Ingersollism.

Now, I will state, for the information of the reverend doctor, that I hav been a resident of Ypsilanti for forty-three years, and in that time hav known a good many Ingersollians, and from anything that I now recall as to them the town would hav been just as safe and orderly without a single policeman as with one hundred, as the reverend doctor intimates; while during the same time I hav known six or eight church officials in disgrace. Some of them are now in Canada, and for prudential reasons not strong advocates of annexation, others of them nestling in Abraham's bosom by the side of that other fellow whose only qualification for the place seems to hav been that he was a beggar and full of sores. Whether they were of the same nature as those that the man after God's own heart complained of when he said: "My bones are rotten, my wounds stink, and my loins are filled with a loathsome disease," deponent saith not. From the communication in THE TRUTH SEEKER, October 3d, from S. P. Putnam, of the state of Washington, it would seem very appropriate for the reverend doctor to use his mighty influence in having one hundred policemen appointed in the town of Oakdale, in the aforesaid state, to protect, not Christians, but Ingersollians from the murderous hate of Christian fanatics. (A good place for Pasteur to locate.) The reverend gentleman seems to insinuate that this is a Christian government, ignoring the fact that the men who framed it were not Christians themselvs, neither believers in Christianity, and that Washington himself in our treaty with Tripoli declares that this is not in any sense a Christian government any more than it is a Jewish or Mohammedan government. No, reverend sir, this, the best and most prosperous government in the world, is not such on account of Christianity, but in spite of it. The reverend is very careful not to tell us that these same Christian governments, with millions of men under arms, are not expecting the millennium to be immediately ushered in, but are looking, if not wishing, for the time to come when they can cut each other's throats on a more magnificent scale than ever before known. JAS. P. DICKINSON.

Between twelve and fifteen hundred people gathered at the corner of Washington and Ellis streets yesterday to witness the ceremony of laying the corner-stone of the new Methodist church.

Rev. L. R. Fiske, D.D., president of Albion College, opened his remarks with the statement that the Christian church means everything to a community. There is no interest of man from the cradle to the grave that is not furthered by it. While it is not the province of the Bible to teach science, yet science flourishes only in Christian lands. So with literature; so with commerce where great highways are between Christian nations. The governments of the world that are of sufficient importance to be recognized in the establishment of international law are Christian communities. Let this town become a representativ of Ingersollism, where men believe in no God, no heaven, no hell, no hereafter, no future but a blank, and a hundred policemen would be needed to preserve the peace.

Won't Hav His Brain Forced into Innocuous Desuetude.

MARINETTE, WIS., Oct. 29, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: It is perhaps unnecessary for me to assure you that your excellent journal is in perfect accord with my theological views in almost every respect. I shall endeavor to send you a new subscriber before my departure for Texas. I hav thus far sold six "Pictorial Text-Books," and think I will be able to dispose of several more.

I hav forwarded to Governor Peck of this state a copy of Brother Reynolds's petition, protesting against the Thanksgiving proclamation mockery. I hav also sent a petition to my old home, Albert Lea, Minn., where it is being circulated among the numerous friends of "intellectual hospitality" by Lyle H. Day, an earnest young Liberal and son of Hon. H. G. Day, the able and heterodox editor of the Albert Lea Standard. Of course I hav not the least idea that these petitions will be instrumental in inducing our public servants to abolish the Thanksgiving proclamation absurdity, but they certainly can do no harm. I believe, however, that we could soon make ourselvs felt if every Freethinker and despiser of sham and hypocrisy in the land would emphatically protest against our public servants thus prostituting their official powers.

I am just in receipt of one of Brother Wettstein's popular Freethought badges, and can truly say that I am more than delighted with them. Were I unable to get another one I would not part with it for many times its cost, not merely on account of the glorious principles it symbolizes, but on account of its beautiful appearance.

This city is a perfect hot-bed of superstition, ignorance, and bigotry. Mr. Pecci, of Rome—I think that is the "infallible" gentleman's name—enjoys absolute sway over the benighted minds of a considerable majority of the people here, and from this fact alone you will be able to form some notion as to their intellectual condition. On account of my radical and outspoken Freethought views, I am, to a considerable extent, a social outcast here, but this does not in the least deter me from whacking away at orthodoxy whenever an opportunity presents itself.

Not long ago one of my esteemed Christian friends felt called upon to write me a letter admonishing me to "turn from the error of my ways"—that is, to be content to remain in a state of mental stagnation, to "sacrifice my individuality and become the living coffin of a dead soul." This led to a short but heated epistolary discussion of this subject. I handled the subject entirely without gloves, and I am inclined to believe that it will be some time before my superstitious, but perhaps well-meaning, friend will undertake to broach the subject of religion to me again. I append an extract from my last letter. JOSEPH A. SANDBURG.

You say that, like myself, "you delight in debate." Well, then, why don't you at least make some attempt to answer at least some of the arguments with which my letter fairly bristled? Why did you worm yourself around each and every one of them? You say, "Debates and arguments are all right." Do you not know that this is contrary to the teachings of the church? Do you not know it to be a fact that every time an Infidel lecturer comes to your town the preachers immediately start prayer-meetings in opposition to him, and that they warn their poor dupes with the stale and contemptible threat of hell-fire not to attend the lectures, for fear they might be transformed from silly and unthinking orthodox sheep into Freethinking goats, and thus detract from their ill-gotten revenue, wrung from the cowardice, fear, and credulity of humanity? Do you not know it to be a fact that these soul-hustlers invariably make themselvs conspicuous by their absence from such lectures; that they obstinately and persistently refuse to meet a brave and honest champion of universal mental liberty in public debate; that they skulk behind the coward's retreat, the pulpit, but as soon as the "horrid Infidel" has departed they immediately resort to their despicable tactics of lying, backbiting, and slandering? You know this to be a fact as well as I do, and were it not for the cloud of prejudice and bigotry before your eyes you would frankly admit it.

I am not trying to "make you admit that there is no God." It is a matter of utter indifference to me whether you believe in a God or not, but if you are not a barbarian you ought to be willing to extend to all others the rights which you claim for yourself. I myself believe in a God which I know exists, namely, force and matter—nature—but I certainly cannot stomach the personal God idea. However, that is not the question we are discussing. I am simply trying to convince you that even an Infidel has rights which Christians ought to be compelled to respect. I am simply trying to convince you that a book of the frightful character of the Holy Bible cannot be the word of an infinitly good and just God. I am trying to convince you that we should not be asked to swallow all sorts of balderdash that the preachers attempt to cram down our throats, and then flaunt the scarecrow of an eternal hell before our eyes if we even make a wry face in attempting to swallow their absurdities. I am endeavoring to make you admit that I should not be compelled to allow my brain to lapse into a condition of absolute "innocuous desuetude"—that the expression of an honest thought can not by any possibility harm an all-powerful being. I am endeavoring to convince you that the world of thought should be absolutely free to all—that it should be without a fetter and without a chain—that it is a free and untrammeled exchange of ideas that makes us move onward and upward to a higher and nobler destiny than the wildest dreams ever pictured upon the brains of our orthodox forefathers—that it is Freethought that has lifted us from the depths of savagery up to our magnificent civilization of to-day. I am endeavoring to convince you that without a free and unfettered brain there would be no progress—that, in the language of that grand man, that splendid intellectual colossus, Colonel Ingersoll, "in the intellectual air there is room for every wing, and on the intellectual sea there is room for every sail."

You say you hav "investigated the subject in question." Now, let me in all candor ask you how many Infidel books and periodicals you hav ever read. Hav you not invariably spurned them as though they had been infected with some terrible contagious disease?

You say, "Why think all Freethinkers perfect?" I never made such a claim, but is it not a fact that the leaders of the intellectual world are, and always hav been, Freethinkers? This no thoroughly honest, intelligent, and well-read person will undertake to dispute. The reason that Infidels are more moral than Christians as a class is that they are vastly more intelligent and civilized. I hav never said anything against the reverend gentleman to whom you refer, although I am reliably informed that he once swore to a lie in a court of justice. However, be that as it may, I decline to attack any man's private character, whether Christian or Infidel. I flatly refuse to deal in personalities. Judging by my experience at least, such despicable and cowardly tactics are peculiar to Christians. Slander is now the only gun in the arsenal of heaven which has not been spiked, and I do not think that Infidels are at all anxious to gain possession of it.

You admit that Mr. Ingersoll is a good and pure man, but, you ask, are all Freethinkers like him? Now, do you not know that statistics show that preachers furnish more criminals in proportion to their number than any other class of men, and it is a remarkable fact that a large majority of these crimes are crimes against women? Is not this a pretty record for a class of "holier than thou" professed teachers of public morality? Do you not also know that it is almost an impossibility to find an Infidel immured in a penitentiary? Judging by the statistics of other states, I undertake to say that in all probability there is not a single outspoken Infidel confined in the penitentiary of your state, and if you will ascertain from an authoritativ source the religious belief of the prisoners confined therein, I hereby agree to pay you $5 for every Infidel, provided you will agree to pay me ten cents for every Christian to be found there. This will be a golden opportunity for you to help me squelch the Christian lie that unbelief tends to produce crime and immorality. I challenge you to show me a single Infidel who to your knowledge has ever been convicted of an offense against the laws of morality. Why, just look for a moment at the Infidels in your own community. Are they not among your most intelligent and respected citizens? Was there ever the faintest breath of scandal connected with them, and are not their characters as far above reproach as any theologian that ever breathed? You will find it the same all the world over. Now, on the other hand, just look at the beautifully checkered characters of some of the devout believers in your fine religion. Every bum, cutthroat, vagabond, and sneak-thief in town, if you were to take the trouble to investigate the matter, you would find to be devout believers in the doctrins of forgivness for sin, vicarious atonement, future rewards and punishments, etc., and the least allusion to Freethought would cause them to involuntarily hold up their hands in holy horror and their pious lips to curl with an idiotic sneer that would remind you of Darwin's "missing link." Now, mind you, please don't misconstrue my meaning. I know perfectly well that there are plenty of good Christians whose standard of morality is just as high as that of Infidels, but taken as a class the unbelievers are far above the Christians as far as morality is concerned. A belief in some of the pernicious doctrins of orthodox Christianity must tend to a dissolution of public morality.

You claim that you are not bigoted on this subject, and then with the next breath declare that "I need not worry a bit about emancipating your mind, as your mind is all right." This shows conclusivly that you hav firmly resolved to reject all arguments against the absurd and senseless doctrins of orthodox Christianity, therefore I am led to infer that the time occupied in writing this letter has been utterly wasted. In the language of Thomas Paine, "To argue with a man who has renounced his reason is like giving medicin to the dead." As Ingersoll says, these words ought to be written in letters of gold and made to adorn the walls of every orthodox church. I am almost willing to wager that were the greatest orator of our time, and perhaps all the time, to lecture in your city, you would refuse to even listen to this magnificent man; but, on the contrary, should the clownish and sensational soul-hustler of Brooklyn advertise himself to perform there, you would almost fall over yourself in your frantic scramble to secure a seat.

If you must believe in a God, why believe him to be the cruel, merciless and bloodthirsty scoundrel of the Bible? Why not believe him to be good and kind and just and merciful? Why believe in a devil and a hell? If the devil continues to roam around "like a roaring lion, seeking whom he may devour," in spite of everything that God can do to stop him, does not this prove that His Satanic Majesty is more powerful than his "daddy," and that the Lord can not be all-powerful—or can it be possible that these monstrosities are in partnership? "If it is a fact that the whole human family is in the hands of such a god and such a devil, I would call upon the angels to pity and to weep" If the Lord is all-powerful, is it not wicked in him to permit this old sooty rascal to thus roam around? If this God is all-powerful and has the welfare of his children at heart, in the name of common sense why does he not arise in his wrath, of which according to the Bible he has a superabundance, and utterly annihilate this horrid devil, and thus forever banish sin, and pain, and suffering from the world?

I hope that I hav said nothing in this letter which in the least offends you. Even the truth is sometimes hard to swallow, and it often requires courage to tell the truth. If you are disposed to "keep the ball rolling," you will at all times find me ready for the fray, and fully prepared to vindicate the reputation of this God, who is said to hav his abode somewhere beyond the clouds, but whom no one has ever yet beheld, although I believe it is claimed by some that Brother Moses carried on a conversation with him "face to face as a man speaketh to his friend," and that he once indecently exposed himself, as related in Lev. xxxiii. 23. If you are inclined to be angry with me at anything I hav said in this letter, I hope that you will generously and magnanimously cover all my supposed transgressions with the broad mantle of charity and forgivness, as you will hav plenty of time to "get even" with me. Remember that while you will be enjoying the society of Lot, and David, and Solomon, and Abraham (the man with the capacious bosom), and other old patriarchs who ought to be in the penitentiary, you can enjoy the infinit pleasure of beholding me slowly sizzle in the devil's frying-pan throughout all eternity.

I remain yours, etc., in the cause of Universal Mental Liberty, JOSEPH A. SANDBURG.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

In Nature's Haunts.

I love to wander in the shade
And revel 'mid some sylvan scene,
Where nature wears a face serene,
And Flora's gifts are all arrayed.

Where twining tendril interweaves;
Where tiny bud unfolds its wings:
Where woodland's sweetest songster sings
On stately bough, 'neath verdant leaves.

Where gentle breezes linger round,
And waft sweet odors from the flow'rs;
Where noontide sun peeps through the bowers
And kisses earth with beauty crowned.

I love to sit beside the brook
And watch its crystal waters leap
O'er mossy stone and rugged steep
From sunny pool to shady nook.

I love to hear its soothing song—
That melody so soft and low
That ushers from its rippling flow,
As playfully it rolls along.

I love to stroll along the brink,
And gather pretty stones and shells;
Or pluck the dainty golden bells
Whose rootlets from its fountains drink.

My very heart is sweetly thrilled
With solitary happiness,
To think that I can hav access
To nature's haunts with beauty filled.

Yes, nature holds within her bounds
So many things that charm the soul,
No wonder that the Indian's goal
Was in the happy hunting-grounds.

Though others look beyond the skies
For future happiness and bliss,
I think I am content with this
Sweet nature's radiant paradise

GEORGE J. REMSBURG.

The Old Windmill.

One of the greatest curiosities in the West is an old windmill located at Lawrence, Kan. It stands on a high hill overlooking the city of Lawrence, and appears like a sentinel keeping guard over the destinies of Lawrence and her people. There it has stood for over a third of a century, withstanding alike the pleasant summer zephyr and the chilling gusts of winter's snow and ice which blow across the Kansas plains. Little does it care whether it is fanned by a gentle summer breeze or a winter hurricane, as it is alike unconscious of both.

Its history is the history of the little town which surrounds it. At the time it was built there were but few marks of the city which has since grown up around it.

Away back in the early part of the sixties my father conceived the idea of utilizing the steady winds and putting their great powers to more use than wafting the dust across the prairie. The men to build the mill had to be brought over from Sweden, as none here understood how to erect such a structure. The Swedes had long since realized what a force the wind is and had turned it to use to drive the millstones and other machinery.

After the mechanics had been produced there were still many difficulties to be overcome, as Kansas was a new state, without a mile of railroad, and with no other means of transportation than the ox team.

The great heavy timber for the structure had to be hauled from the Indian Territory, a distance of four hundred miles over the wild prairie, with no road or trail to follow, and every creek had to be forded or bridged, and often the teams were delayed for a week by the swollen streams. All the iron and heavy machinery had to be brought from Fort Leavenworth, as that was the nearest railroad point.

The years when the mill was being built were during the late war, when Kansas was in the midst of bitter strife, as both sides wished to claim it.

When Quantrell raided our little town and massacred half of our male population, and burnt all our houses and stores, he also attempted to burn the mill, but did not succeed, as all the timber was too green to burn and could not be ignited easily, and Quantrell and his men were loath to overexert themselvs at anything which had the appearance of work; so they gave up after one trial.

When finally completed it towered up into the sky like the fabled giants of old of whom we hav all heard so much.

The structure has eight sides, so it would giv as little surface as possible for the wind to bear against; it rests on a wide foundation and tapers toward the top, the main structure being about seventy-five feet high. The wings are eighty feet from tip to tip and are eleven feet wide.

The top, which contains the main shaft through which the wings pass, is loose and revolves on a track, so that the wings can be turned to face the wind when blowing from any point of the compass. The wings consist of a main arm, through which are passed slats, forming a latticework on which the rails are spread so as to catch the wind and furnish the power. This mill is the largest mill of its kind in the United States and cost originally a little over $13,000.

It was first used almost exclusivly for grinding purposes but later it was used to furnish power for a plow factory; but now as its days of usefulness are over it is standing idle, and as it has done good service it is entitled to a rest.

It has lately been purchased by the city charity committee and is going to be used as an art gallery, for the benefit of the poor, and it will be one of the most romantic art galleries in the country.

This mill is one of the landmarks of Kansas and is to that noble state what the old ruinous castles on the Rhine are to Germany, or the ruins of the Parthenon are to Greece. If the old mill could talk what a tale it could tell of the people who visited it and left their autographs written on the board on the inside of the structure.

This mill is such a curiosity that a large silver manufacturer has gotten up a souvenir spoon with a picture of the old mill in the bowl and it is said that they can hardly keep up with their orders. The mill has been twice struck by lightning and been on fire once, but in spite of it all it still stands a noble monument to the memory of the man who conceived and planned its building.

Earliest Methods of Measuring Time.

The story is that King Alfred had no better way to tell the time than by burning twelve candles, each of which lasted two hours; and, when all the twelve were gone, another day had passed. Long before the time of Alfred, and long before the time of Christ, the shadow of the sun told the hour of the day by means of a sun-dial. The old Chaldeans so placed a hollow hemisphere, with a bead in the center, that the shadow of the bead on the inner surface told the hour of the day. Other kinds of dials were afterward made with a tablet of wood or straight piece of metal. On the tablets were marked the different hours. When the shadow came to the mark IX, it was 9 o'clock in the morning. The dial was sometimes placed near the ground, or in towers of buildings. The old clock on the eastern end of Faneuil Hall, in Boston, was formerly a dial of this kind; and on some of the old church towers in England you may see them to-day. Aside from the kinds mentioned, the dials now in existence are intended more for ornament than for use. In the days when dials were used, each one contained a motto of some kind, like these: "Time flies like the shadow;" or, "I tell no hours but those that are happy."

But the dial could be used only in the daytime, and, even then, it was worthless when the sun was covered with clouds. In order to measure the hours of the night as well as the hours of the day, the Greeks and Romans used the clepsydra, which means, "The water steals away." A large jar was filled with water, and a hole was made in the bottom through which the water could run. The glass in those days was not transparent. No one could see from the outside how much water had escaped. So there were made, on the inside, certain marks that told the hours as the water ran out; or else a stick with notches in the edge was dipped into the water, and the depth of what was left showed the hour. Sometimes the water dropped into another jar in which a block of wood was floating, the block rising as the hours went on. Once in a while, some very rich man had a clepsydra that sounded a musical note at every hour.—Popular Science Monthly.

Wonders of the Body.

Suppose your age to be fifteen or thereabouts. You hav two hundred bones and six hundred muscles; your blood weighs twenty-five pounds; your heart is five inches in length and three inches in diameter; it beats seventy times per minute, 42,000 times per hour, 100,800 per day, 35,792,000 per year. At each beat a little over two ounces of blood is thrown out of it, and each day it receives and discharges about seven tons of that wonderful fluid. Your lungs will contain a gallon of air, and you inhale 24,000 gallons per day. The aggregate surface of the air cells of your lungs, supposing them to be spread out, exceeds 20,000 square inches. The weight of your brain is three pounds; when you are a man it will weigh about eight ounces more. Your nerves exceed 10,000,000 in number. Your skin is composed of three layers, and varies from one-fourth to one-eighth of an inch in thickness. The area of your skin is about 1,700 inches. Each square inch contains about 2,500 sweating-tubes or perspiratory pores, each of which may be likened to a little draining-tile one-fourth of an inch long, making an aggregate length of the surface of your body of 88,541 feet, or a tile ditch for draining the body almost seventeen miles long.

Children's Quaint Sayings.

A child seeing a bill on a telegraph post: "Oh, mamma, look! a message has fallen down."

Tottie: "I wonder why dolls are always girls, Tom?" Tom: "Because boys hate to be made babies of."

Little boy, learning his catechism from his mother: Q: "What is a man's chief end?" A: "His head."

A little girl, aged five, going to bed one night, and kneeling down to say her prayers, said: "O, mamma, may I only say amen to-night? I am so tired."

Mamma: "And David was able to kill that great big man Goliath because God helped him." Harry (aged six): "Well, I don't call that fair, mamma; that's two and one."

Girl (yawning over lessons): "I'm so tired; I should like to go to sleep." Boy: "I'll tell you what to do, then; get up early to-morrow and hav a good sleep before breakfast."

Small boy, watching his sister iron a piece of work with bird's nest of eggs done in crewels on it: "I say, sister, if you keep the iron so long on those eggs you'll hatch 'em."

Jack (aged four, taking a walk): "What becomes of people when they die?" Mamma: "They turn into dust, dear." Jack: "What a lot of people there must be on this road, then."

A little girl had a penny given her to drop in the collection-box at church. When she dropped in the coin she exclaimed, "That's the way the money goes; pop goes the weasel."

A little girl, seeing two love birds billing and cooing, was told that they were making love. "Why don't they marry?" she asked; "then they would not make love any more."

As we were talking one day about churches and their curious ceremonies, a little boy remarked that he had seen a christening, a funeral, and a wedding, but he had never seen a divorce.

A precocious boy of six years, listening wearily to a long-winded tale related by a prosy relativ, took advantage of a short pause to say, slyly: "I wish that story had been brought out in numbers."

"Little baby is very ill, Charley: I am afraid he will die." "Well, if he does die, mamma, he won't go to the bad place." "Why, Charlie, how can you know that?" "Oh, I know he can't, mamma; he's got no teeth to gnash."

A fond mother said to her little son: "Tommy, my dear, I am going to giv you a little companion soon; which would you prefer, a little boy or a little girl?" "Well, mother," replied Tommy, "if it is all the same to you, I would rather hav a little donkey."

Correspondence.

ASPEN, COL., Nov. 10, 1891

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: I thought that I would write you a letter, as it has been some time since I hav written to the Corner. I hav been studying shorthand and typewriting for two months and can write quite well. It is snowing to-day.

Colorado is not so cold as some people think. Papa has been taking THE TRUTH SEEKER for two years. Mr. Shaw, the well-known Liberalist of Galveston, Tex., lectured here for three evenings. The Rev. Mr. Williams replied to him. I like shorthand and it is easy to learn. I would like to correspond with the boys and girls of the Corner. It is snowing so hard that I cannot see the mountains. OSCAR KINDRICK.

[Oscar's letter is written nicely and shows that he is familiar with the typewriter. Write again, Oscar.—ED. C. C.]

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

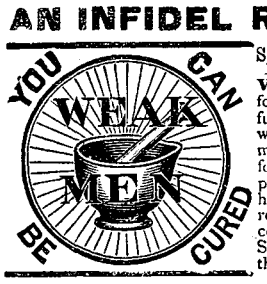
DONALD KENNEDY

Of Roxbury, Mass., Says:



Strange cases cured by my MEDICAL DISCOVERY come to me every day. Here is one of Paralysis—Blindness—and the Grip. Now how does my MEDICAL DISCOVERY cure all these? I don't know, unless it takes hold of the Hidden Poison that makes all Humor.

VIRGINIA CITY, NEVADA, Sept. 9'h, 1891.

Donald Kennedy—Dear Sir: I will state my case to you: About nine years ago I was paralyzed in my left side, and the best doctors gave me no relief for two years, and I was advised to try your DISCOVERY, which did its duty, and in a few months I was restored to health. About four years ago I became blind in my left eye by a spotted cataract. Last March I was taken with La Grippe, and was confined to my bed for three months. At the end of that time, as in the start, then it struck me that your DISCOVERY was the thing for me: so I got a bottle, and before it was half gone I was able to go to my work in the mines. Now in regard to my eyes, as I lost my left eye, and about six months ago my right eye became affected with black spots over the sight as did the left eye—perhaps some twenty of them—but since I have been using your DISCOVERY they all left my right eye but one; and, thank God, the bright light of heaven is once more making its appearance in my left eye. I am wonderfully astonished at it and thank God and your MEDICAL DISCOVERY.

Yours truly, HANK WHITE.

ESSENCE OF CHRISTIANITY.

BY LUDWIG FEUERBACH.

Translated from the German by Geo. Eliot.

Price, $3.

News of the Week.

MRS CARPENTER, of Bridgeport, Conn., grew despondent over prediction of misfortune by a fortune-telling machine and has become insane. Bridgeport priests hav come out strongly against the machine, saying that fortune-telling is forbidden by their church.

THE Emmett theatrical troupe has been arrested at Pittsburgh for parading on Sunday.

THE Chicago superintendent of police may be impeached for unwarranted Anarchist raids.

THE Austrian emperor says that the famin in Russia will tend to induce that nation to make war.

HELSINGFORS, the capital of Finland, is suppressing the Salvation Army. The papers hav been warned not to mention the Army's doings.

GEORGE EDWARD CURTIS, scientific assistant in the Smithsonian Institute, pronounces Dyrenforth's rain-making attempts utterly futil.

AT LOS Angeles three Yuma Indians hav been sentenced to death for murdering, in accordance with their laws, a medicin man who failed to bring rain.

AFTER the pilgrim riots France in fear of national embroilment with Italy, forbid its bishops getting up pilgrimages. Several bishops hav disobeyed and will be prosecuted.

"CIVIL war, famin, pestilence, and conspiracy," says a dispatch, are all going on in holy Russia "in a way which must effect startling results of some kind very soon."

A WOMAN sitting before a New York house in the rain replied to a question, "The Lord has told me to rest here. He has made me a queen." She was committed for examination as to sanity.

CARDINAL MANNING says: "I am afraid that Sunday newspapers create Sunday work. Six days of the week are quite enough for the news of the world. I certainly think that the reading of Sunday newspapers—or I will say bad Sunday newspapers, that I may not expose myself to any action for libel—has a direct and powerful influence in corrupting the morals of people."

A BRAZIL dispatch says: "The republican form of government has not panned out as they expected. There is a powerful faction desiring the reinstatement of the empire. They want Dom Pedro's son or his nephew on the throne. Since the fall of the empire prices of every commodity hav doubled. The government has imposed a high tariff, and the people hav the idea that a large part of the money gets into private pockets instead of into the state treasury."

CATHOLICS are indignant at the attempt of King Humbert of Italy to supplant the religious marriage with the civil by decreeing: "We hav decreed and do decree: Article. For § 226 of the regulations for military discipline in the army is substituted the following: § 226 With no less firmness and severity should the commandants of the army corps take care to repress the earliest signs of concubinage, arising from improper unions, and too often the cause of scandals, of disorders, and of violence. Religious marriage, which is only a modification of concubinage, should of itself be considered a grave crime deserving punishment when officially ascertained. Given at Monza (the royal residence) this 7th day of October, 1891.—Umberto."

MRS. CHURCH, of Passaic, N. J., is dying of cancer and uses no ameliorativ medicins. "When did I first believe in the curing by faith?" she says. "Not until six years ago. Of course I believed in the miracles of olden times, and I had read some few books about divine healing, but never until then was it brought home to me that the Lord still had power to save. It happened that my husband fell sick. . . . I fell asleep. In the morning suddenly I awoke. A face radiant with happiness and holiness had leaned over me and whispered in my ear: 'Whatsoever ye shall ask of the father in my name he will giv it you.' Three or four days afterward my husband began to recover. I hav taken no medicins. I do not intend to take any. My faith upholds me. The Lord will cure me."

JOB PATIENTLY GROWLETH ABOUT HIS CONDITION.—Job iii.

Gems of Thought.

IT cannot be doubted that, as emperor, the religious incredulity which I felt was favorable to the nations which I had to govern. How could I hav favored equally sects so opposed to one another if I had been under the influence of one of them? How could I hav preserved the independence of my thoughts and actions under the control of a confessor who would hav governed me by the dread of hell? What power cannot a wicked man, the most stupid of mankind, thus exercise over those by whom whole nations are governed.—Napoleon Bonaparte.

RELIGION, far from acknowledging the power of reason, boasted of having subjected and humbled it. Politics considered as just what had been consecrated by compact, by constant practice, and ancient customs. It was only in the sacred books, in respected authors, in the bulls of popes, in the rescripts of kings, in registers of old usages, and in the annals of the church, that maxims or examples were sought for from which to infer rights. The business was never to examin the intrinsic merits of a principle, but to interpret, to appreciate, to support or to annul by other texts those upon which it might be founded. A proposition was not adopted because it was true, but because it was written in this or that book, and had been embraced in such a country and such an age.—D'Holbach.

IT is urged that "the acceptance of Christianity by a large portion of the generation contemporary with its founder and his apostle was, under the circumstances, an adjudication as solemn and authoritativ as mortal intelligence could pronounce." If this is true, then "the acceptance of Buddhism by a large portion of the generation contemporary with its founder was an adjudication as solemn and authoritativ as mortal intelligence could pronounce." The same could be said of Mohammedanism, and, in fact, of every religion that has ever benefited or cursed this world. This argument, when reduced to its simplest form, is this: All that succeeds is inspired.—Ingersoll.

THE thing revealed is revelation to the person only to whom it is made His account of it to another is not revelation; and whoever puts faith in that account, puts it in the man from whom the account comes.—Paine.

IT has become my great aim so to advance my own nature and that of others that the world may be better for my life. Not the salvation of men's souls from hell, but the elevation of their hearts and minds, and the bettering of their social condition, is now my desire.—Robert C. Adams.

PUSHING aside all the major and minor prophets, from weeping Jeremiah to raving John of Patmos, we will take a solitary glance at the prophetic attainments of the only begotten son of the author of the Bible. Christ himself, it must be remembered, tried his hand at prophecy. If he was no prophet, he was no fool; for he took care that his great prophecy was to be fulfilled after his death. This is always a wise precaution; for, if the prophecy be not fulfilled, the prophet is saved the hazard of being branded an arrant impostor. Christ, when he tried his hand at prophecy—having previously tried his hand at the jack-plane—foretold that he would return to the earth for the second time before the generation to which he appeared had passed away. His followers distinctly understood this promis and looked for him. He is now more than eighteen hundred years overdue. Even so, Lord Jesus, come quickly! It must be kept in mind that punctuality was never a characteristic of the Lord. Perhaps it was for lack of this valuable quality he had to giv up the respectable call of carpentering to take to lay preaching. He took "no note of time." He prophesied that he would remain in the grave three days and three nights (seventy-two hours), and he remained in it at most twenty-nine hours and a half. He prophesied that he would come back to the earth before the demise of the then generation. That generation passed away eighteen centuries ago, and Christ has not yet come! Well may he be expected to now "come quickly." He has, to this day, dupes who believe in his prophecy, and who possibly hav a cab constantly standing at the nearest railway station "waiting for the coming of the Lord Jesus."—Saladin.

Notes and Clippings.

MRS. LIZZIE F. DODGE, who was held guilty of profanity and other sins by a church in Lynn, Mass, has written a letter of self-defense to the church authorities. She quotes from an opinion that she has received from a Boston lawyer, in which he says that the word "damn" has been held by the Massachusetts supreme court to be not profane.

A STRANGE custom among the Bayanzi, who liv along the upper Congo, has been described by explorers. Brass rings, sometimes weighing thirty pounds, are welded around the necks of the wives. At first the neck becomes raw by the chafing of the ring, but after a while it becomes calloused, although a woman has to hold the ring up frequently to get relief from the weight. The ring is never put around a woman's neck until she has attained her full development. The women are proud of the ornament, believing that it enhances their importance and beauty.

THE impracticable character of Count Tolstoi, the Russian novelist, is clearly shown by his manifesto to the Russian government, declaring that unless it guarantee to feed the people until the next harvest, and faithfully perform the pledge, there will be a revolution, in which he, Tolstoi, will take part himself. It may be impossible even for the autocrat of all the Russias to save his people from the consequences of famin, for the means of a government depend on the product of loans, taxation, or confiscation, and if, as in Europe today, Russia's credit in the money market is broken, on what can the government rely but confiscation? Can a humanitarian Anarchist like Tolstoi consistently favor confiscation instead of voluntary charity? And can Tolstoi, the preacher of peace at all hazards, consistently advocate a revolution if confiscation fails or is denied? Surely such a manifesto is the act of a vague sentimentalist, not of either a serious philanthropist or a philosophic statesman.

A CLERGYMAN writes in the Herald of the dangers of morality: "There is no subject so hard to deal with in the church as that of morality. The danger is that in preaching morality those who receive and follow it are disposed to rely upon it for salvation. The Pharisees and Sadducees were moralists, but Mary Magdalene and the other woman that was a sinner, the Prodigal Son, the thief on the cross, the publican in the Temple—these were the Christian types. Not a boasted morality, but a weeping penitence is the spirit desired."

A MASTODON'S tooth, ten inches long, seven inches from the crown to the roots, and weighing five and a quarter pounds, was found by a prospector on Goble creek, Ore., a few days ago.

THE Christmas Dramatic Mirror will contain an article by—to use that paper's words—"the matchless orator, Shaksperean scholar, and giant of Freethought, Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll." "It is seldom," says that journal, "that the public enjoys the opportunity to read Colonel Ingersoll's splendid productions, and then only in the pages of the great reviews. But in our holiday number he will write of a subject that deeply concerns the drama, the drama's votaries, and the play-going classes."

THE differences in character between the people of the various sections of Brazil, a country about as big as the United States, are very marked. The states south of the equator are industrious and enterprising, but the northern states, in which the heat is oppressiv, and the means of life can easily be got, are languid and indolent. The natural resources of the northern section of Brazil surpass those of the southern section, and yet the southerners are more prosperous than the northerners.

A PAROCHIAL SCHOOL EDUCATION—FILLING THE CHILDREN'S MINDS WITH RUBBISH.

A FEMININ vegetarian of this city is engaged in organizing a Vegetarian society, to take the place of the society of the same kind that once existed here and waged war upon the horrible practice of devouring flesh, fowl, fish, and oysters. She says there are five thousand vegetarians in Boston and two thousand in Chicago, besides others in New York and elsewhere. She herself once lived on apples for several weeks at small cost, and there are people in Boston who liv happily on bread, vegetables, and fruits at the rate of $3 a week. She says that vegetarianism is health-giving, strengthening, and spiritualizing, especially if its disciples avoid such animal products as milk, cheese, and eggs, as well as meats.

THE horseshoe superstition still sticks, and junk dealers find it profitable to keep horseshoes in stock for sale to dwellers in the tenement-house region, where a horseshoe over the door is still not uncommon. If all the money drawers of small shops could be rummaged, enough horseshoes could be found to supply half the equines in town. The superstition is that the shop will do a good business so long as the presence of the horseshoe is known only to the shopkeeper. On a recent rainy afternoon a neatly dressed girl daintily picking her way across Fifth avenue at Twenty-eighth street suddenly stopped, stooped, picked up a wet and dirty horseshoe, tucked it away under her waterproof, and went on in smiling anticipation of good luck.

FLORENCE, the actor, once gave some advice to a friend in these words: "My Dear ——: One gallon of whisky costs about $3, and contains about sixty-five fifteen-cent drinks. Now, if you must drink, buy a gallon and make your wife the barkeeper. When you are dry, giv her fifteen cents for a drink, and when the whisky is gone she will hav, after paying for it, $6.75 left, and every gallon thereafter will yield the same profit. This money she should put away, so that when you hav become an inebriate, unable to support yourself and shunned by every respectable man, your wife may hav money enough to keep you until your time comes to fill a drunkard's grave."

THE greatest revival that the church needs is a revival of true morality. There is no cause which operates so much to keep men outside the church as a knowledge of the fact that so many in the livery of religion are serving the devil.—Herald.

Selected.

The Three Philanthropists.*

I.

Well, while I am a beggar, I will rail,
And say there is no sin but to be rich.

Mr. A. lived in the kingdom of ———. He was a sincere professional philanthropist. He was absolutely certain that he loved his fellow-men, and that his views were humane and scientific. He concluded to turn his attention to taking care of people less fortunate than himself.

With this object in view he investigated the common people that lived about him, and he found that they were extremely ignorant, that many of them seemed to take no particular interest in life or in business, that few of them had any theories of their own, and that, while many had muscle, there was only now and then one who had any mind worth speaking of. Nearly all of them were destitute of ambition. They were satisfied if they got something to eat, a place to sleep, and could now and then indulge in some form of dissipation. They seemed to hav great confidence in to morrow—trusted to luck, and took no thought for the future. Many of them were extravagant, most of them dissipated, and a good many dishonest.

After having obtained this information Mr. A. made up his mind to do what little he could to better their condition. He petitioned the king to assist him, and asked that he be allowed to take control of five hundred people in consideration that he would pay a certain amount into the treasury of the kingdom. The king, being satisfied that Mr. A. could take care of these people better than they were taking care of themselvs, granted the petition.

Mr. A., with the assistance of a few soldiers, took these people from their old homes and haunts to a plantation of his own. He divided them into groups, and over each group placed a superintendent. He made certain rules and regulations for their conduct. They were only compelled to work from twelve to fourteen hours a day, leaving ten hours for sleep and recreation. Good and substantial food was provided. Their houses were comfortable and their clothing sufficient. Their work was laid out from day to day and from month to month, so that they knew exactly what they were to do in each hour of every day. These rules were made for the good of the people, to the end that they might not interfere with each other, that they might attend to their duties, and enjoy themselvs in a reasonable way. They were not allowed to waste their time, or to use stimulants or profane language. They were told to be respectful to the superintendents, and especially to Mr. A.; to be obedient, and, above all, to accept the position in which providence had placed them, without complaining, and to cheerfully perform their tasks.

Some denounced the entire proceeding as unwarranted, as contrary to reason and justice. These insisted that the five hundred people had a right to liv in their own way, provided they did not interfere with others; that they had the right to go through the world with little food and with poor clothes, and to liv in huts, if such was their choice. But Mr. A. had no trouble in answering these objections. He insisted that well being is the only good, and that every human being is under obligation, not only to take care of himself, but to do what little he can toward taking care of others; that where five hundred people neglect to take care of themselvs, it is the duty of somebody else, who has more intelligence and more means, to take care of them; that the man who takes five hundred people and improves their condition, givs them on the average better food, better clothes, and keeps them out of mischief, is a benefactor.

Mr. A. also took the ground that providence, by giving him superior intelligence, the genius of command, the aptitude for taking charge of others, had made it his duty to exercise these faculties for the well-being of the people and for the glory of God. Mr. A. frequently declared that he was God's steward. He often said he thanked God that he was not governed by a sickly sentiment, but that he was a man of sense, of force of character, and that the means employed by him were in accordance with the logic of facts.

Mr. A. was very successful. In a few years he had several thousands of men, women, and children working for him. He amassed a large fortune. He felt that he had been intrusted with this money by providence. He therefore built several churches, and once in a while gave large sums to societies for the spread of civilization. He passed away regretted by a great many people—not including those who had lived under his immediate administration. He was buried with great pomp, the king being one of the pall-bearers, and on his tomb was this: "He was the providence of the poor."

II.

And, being rich, my virtue then shall be
To say there is no vice but beggary.

Mr. B. did not believe in slavery. He despised the institution with every drop of his blood, and was an advocate of universal freedom. He held all of the ideas of Mr. A. in supreme contempt, and frequently spent whole evenings in denouncing the inhumanity and injustice of the whole business. He even went so far as to contend that some of A.'s slaves had more intelligence than A. himself, and that, whether they had intelligence or not, they had the right to be free. He insisted that Mr. A.'s philanthropy was a sham; that he never bought a human being for the purpose of bettering that being's condition; that he went into the business simply to make money for himself; and that his talk about his slaves committing less crime than when they were free was simply to justify the crime committed by himself in enslaving his fellow man.

Mr. B. was a manufacturer, and he employed some five or six thousand men. He used to say that these men were not forced to work for him; that they were at perfect liberty to accept or reject the terms; that, so far as he was concerned, he would just as soon commit larceny or robbery as to force a man to work for him. "Every laborer under my roof," he used to say, "is as free to choose as I am."

Mr. B. had made a large amount of money. Many of his workmen complained that their wages did not allow them to liv in comfort. Many had large families, and therefore but little to eat. Some of them lived in crowded rooms. Many of the children were carried off by disease; but Mr. B. took the ground that all these people had a right to go, that he did not force them to remain, that if they were not healthy it was not his fault, and that whenever it pleased providence to remove a child, or one of the parents, he, Mr. B., was not responsible.

Mr. B. insisted that many of his workmen were extravagant; that they bought things that they did not need; that they wasted in beer and tobacco money that they should save for funerals; that many of them visited places of amusement when they should hav been thinking about death, and that others bought toys to please the children when they hardly had bread enough to eat. He felt that he was in no way responsible for this extravagance, nor for the fact that their wages did not giv them the necessaries of life, because he not only gave them the same wages that other manufacturers gave, but the same wages that other workmen were willing to work for.

Mr. B. said—and he always said this as though it ended the argument—and he generally stood up to say it: "The great law of supply and demand is of divine origin; it is the only law that will work in all possible or conceivable cases; and this law fixes the price of all labor, and from it there is no appeal. If people are not satisfied with the operation of this law, let them make a new world for themselvs."

In a few years Mr. B. was the owner of many millions. He also considered himself as one of God's stewards; felt that providence had given him the intelligence to combine interests, to carry out great schemes, and that he was specially raised up to giv employment to many thousands of people. He often regretted that he could do no more for his laborers without lessening his own profits, or, rather, without lessening his fund for the blessing of mankind—the blessing to begin immediately after his death. He was so anxious to be the providence of posterity that he was sometimes almost heartless in his dealings with contemporaries. He felt that it was necessary for him to be economical, to save every dollar that he could, because in this way he could increase the fund that was finally to bless mankind. He also felt that in this way he could lay the foundations of a permanent fame—that he could build, through his executors, an asylum to be called the "B. Asylum," that he could fill a building with books to be called the "B. Library," and that he could also build and endow an institution of learning to be called the "B. College," and that, in addition, a large amount of money could be given for the purpose of civilizing the citizens of less fortunate countries, to the end that they might become imbued with that spirit of combination and manufacture that results in putting large fortunes in the hands of those who hav been selected by providence, on account of their talents, to make a better distribution of wealth than those who earned it could hav done.

Mr. B., like Mr. A., was a man of judgment. He had what is called a level head, was not easily turned aside from his purpose, and felt that he was in accord with the general sentiment of his time. By his own exertions he rose from poverty to wealth. He was born in a hut and died in a palace. He was a patron of art and enriched his walls with the works of the masters. He insisted that others could and should follow his example. For those who failed or refused he had no sympathy. He accounted for their poverty and wretchedness by saying: "These paupers hav only themselvs to blame." He died without ever having lost a dollar. His funeral was magnificent, and clergymen vied with each other in laudations of the dead. Over his dust rises a monument of marble with the words: "He lived for others."

III.

But there are men who steal, and vainly try
To gild the crime with pompous charity.

There was another man, Mr. C., who also had the genius for combination. He understood the value of capital, the value of labor; knew exactly how much could be done with machinery; understood the economy of things; knew how to do everything in the easiest and shortest way. And he, too, was a manufacturer and had in his employ many thousands of men, women, and children. He was what is called a visionary, a sentimentalist, rather weak in his will, not very obstinate, had but little egotism; and it never occurred to him that he had been selected by providence, or any supernatural power, to divide the property of others. It did not seem to him that he had any right to take from other men their labor without giving them a full equivalent.

He also insisted that we should not take advantage of each other's necessities; that you should not ask a drowning man a greater price for lumber than you would if he stood on the shore; that if you took into consideration the necessities of your fellow-man, it should be only to lessen the price of that which you would sell to him, not to increase it. He insisted that honest men do not take advantage of their fellows. He was so weak that he had not perfect confidence in the great law of supply and demand as applied to flesh and blood. He took into consideration another law of supply and demand; he knew that the workingman had to be supplied with food, and that his nature demanded something to eat, a house to liv in, clothes to wear.

At the end of the first year he found that he had made a large profit, and thereupon he divided this profit with the people who had earned it. Some of his friends said to him that he ought to endow some public institution; that there should be a college in his nativ town; but Mr. C. was of such a peculiar turn of mind that he thought justice ought to go before charity, and a little in front of egotism and a desire to immortalize one's self. He said that it seemed to him that of all persons in the world entitled to this profit were the men who had earned it, the men who had made it by their labor, by days of actual toil. He insisted that, as they had earned it, it was really theirs, and if it was theirs, they should hav it and should spend it in their own way.

Mr. C. said: "I cannot be happy if those who work for me are defrauded. If I feel I am taking what belongs to them, then my life becomes miserable. To feel that I hav done justice is one of the necessities of my nature. I do not wish to establish colleges. I wish to establish no public institution. My desire is to enable those who work for me to establish a few thousand homes for themselvs. My ambition is to enable them to buy the books they really want to read. I do not wish to establish a hospital, but I want to make it possible for my workmen to hav the services of the best physicians—physicians of their own choice. It is not for me to take their money and use it for the good of others or for my own glory. It is for me to giv what they hav earned to them. After I hav given them the money that belongs to them, I can giv them my advice—I can tell them how I hope they will use it; and after I hav advised them, they will use it as they please. You cannot make great men and great women by suppression. Slavery is not the school in which genius is born. Every human being must make his own mistakes for himself, must learn for himself, must hav his own experience; and if the world improves it must be from choice, not from force; and every man who does justice, who sets the example of fair dealing, hastens the coming of universal honesty, of universal civilization."

Mr. C. carried his doctrin out to the fullest extent, honestly and faithfully. When he died, there were at the funeral those who had worked for him, their wives and their children. Their tears fell upon his grave. They planted flowers and paid to him the tribute of their love. Above his silent dust they erected a monument with this inscription: "He allowed others to liv for themselvs."

A Christmas or New Year's Present.

The "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book" in cloth binding ($2 50) is one of the best Christmas or New Year's presents a Liberal can make to a friend. Christmas is a pagan festival and New Year's is only a mark of time, but the Text-Book is a thing of beauty and a joy forever, and will help to rationalize the festival and make your friend forget the flight of years.

The Freereligious societies of Vienna hav taken up the social question.

In 1870 the disciples of Ignatius Loyola numbered 10,529 persons; in 1880, 10,494; in 1882, 11,058; and at the present time there are over 12,000 Jesuits.

Somehow or another Christians can never make theory and practice work the same way. According to the Rev. Dr. Strong, D.D., the orthodox Protestants of this country hav estate valued at $13,075,300,000. "Blessed be ye poor."

The monument in honor of Mr. Mathat, the Belgian Freethinker, whose remains were insulted by the mayor of Waterloo, is favorably commented upon by the Belgian secular press. It is the work of a brother Freethinker, architect Allard, secretary to the Freethought society "Evolution," at St. Gilles.

The spirit of Yankee enterprise has seized upon our Dutch contemporary De Dageraad. The publishers propose to giv with each number of their monthly magazine sixteen royal octavo pages of Lecky's "History of Rationalism," and continue until the work is all published. De Dageraad is an excellent magazine, always newsy and instructiv, and its publishers are to be congratulated. We hope the new scheme will prove a success, and secure many additional subscribers.

In 1844 1,200,000 persons undertook the pilgrimage to the holy coat in Trier. This year the number swelled to 1,925,130; that is, 725,130 persons hav been added to the number of self-confessed fools since 1844. In that year the Luxemburger Zeitung announced five different kinds of miracles to hav occurred; this year it announces not one. Hav the miraculous powers of the coat been lost, or has the power of the devil increased, or does the Catholic church fear another secession?

The holy coat show at Trier is over, and now a holy house exhibition is to take place. In the year 1291 the Holy Ghost hitched some of the angels to one of the celestial chariots and drove to Nazareth, from whence he brought as a load the house of Mamma Mary. Not having a map with him showing the geography of the earth since it ceased to be flat, he unloaded the house in Dalmatia. Jehovah, Mary's husband, son, and papa (vide Nicene creed), discovered the mistake, and by the same means of transportation the holy shanty was removed to Loretto, where it is now found. The show is free, but a collection will be taken up.

The Hungario-American weekly, Onállás (Independence), a newly born, well-edited, and patriotic sheet, which has made its appearance in Hazleton, Pa., tells us that there is trouble brewing in the Roman Catholic church here in the United States There are several thousands of Ruthenians (Hungarian Russians) in this country. They belong to the Roman Catholic church, but follow Greek ceremonies, use ancient Slav or modern languages instead of Latin, and their priests prefer marrying to keeping a mistress. The Catholic bishops do not like such priests, and hav petitioned the pope to call them back. Hence the trouble brewing. We hope the pope will, so that the Catholics can hav a family quarrel just like the Protestants.

The Freethinkers in Belgium deserve praise for the activity shown by them. October 25th, their annual national congress took place; November 1st, l'Union Fraternelle, of Braine-le-Comte, had a great rally on occasion of the presentation to the union of a new and handsome banner. Our friend, M. Leon Furnemont, president of the Freethought society of Brüssel and editor of La Raison, delivered an oration on "The Dead Heroes of Freethought." Ten societies, with music and banners, partook in the celebration. We suggest that American Freethinkers follow the example set by their Belgian brethren and institute public celebrations on other days besides the birthday of Thomas Paine. We must let the people know that Freethinkers liv, that Freethinkers work, that Freethinkers hav a TRUTH SEEKER, of which latter hand out your old numbers to them for perusal.

Under the title "Ook Een Weeshius—Maar Geen Christelijk" (Also an Orphan Asylum—But Not a Christian) does Mr. Alexis Sluys giv the readers of De Dageraad a history of the orphan asylum erected by Hon. J. G. Prévost in 1861 upon an estate belonging to him in the department of Seine de Oempuis, Oise, France. He died in 1875, and willed the institution to the above-named department. It accommodates now one hundred and fifty children of both sexes. The children are admitted when four to six years of age and remain there until they are sixteen years old. They are taught the various trades. The teaching of Christianity is positivly forbidden, and what is more, this wish of the philanthropic Freethinker is respected. Moral instruction, as taught in Comte's system of philosophy, is given to the children.

A Letter of Farewell from Captain Otto Thomson.

MR. EDITOR: Through the medium of THE TRUTH SEEKER allow me to say my farewell to my foreign correspondents and many friends abroad, now when I hav left, perhaps forever, the Swedish Freethought paper, Fritänkaren, with the same affectionate feelings of regret as when a parent takes a final leave of a beloved child.

I sincerely thank you all for the great many testimonies of sympathy and of acknowledgment for my poor but honest and ardent efforts for Freethought and liberty of conscience.

Though now an impoverished old man, you will nevertheless still find me a fellow-champion in the ranks of the international Freethought army, and I do hope that when I at last drop down, our battalions will advance with a spotless, flying Freethought banner, unchecked and victoriously, conquering superstition and ignorance.

To those of you who will sometimes beguile the coming tedious hours of an old man with a few lines or with Freethought papers, I cannot heartily enough express my gratitude.

My warmest and best wishes to you all.

Your forever sincere fellow-champion and friend,

Stockholm, Sweden. OTTO THOMPSON.

Liberalism at Vancouver, B. C.

Vancouver, B. C., is the terminal city, not alone of the great Canadian Pacific, but of all railroad lines of the entire Puget Sound country, and is destined to be the great distributing point for the Oriental trade. China, Japan, and Australian lines are already established, making a ferry across the Pacific from Vancouver to Yokohama like that over the Atlantic from New York to Liverpool.

Vancouver is a young city with all of the Johnny Bull solid, sturdy growth, enthused and accelerated by Yankee genius, push, and enterprise.

On October 21st to 23d I delivered three lectures at Market Hall, a most magnificent hall of colossal proportions. The weather was unpropitious—pouring rain nearly the whole time of my sojourn in the city, with the exception of about one-half an hour each evening, between a quarter before 8 and quarter past. We had about five hundred people on Wednesday night, six hundred on Thursday, and over seven hundred on Friday night. The interest increased and on Friday night reached a furor of enthusiasm.

I made my usual loving invitation for any minister in good standing in the community to come forward and defend his faith, expose my errors, and prove to the people present that the Bible is of divine inspiration, and that Jesus Christ is the son of God and savior of the world, offering them one-half the time, or three-quarters if they thought half would not be fair; promising them if they could not afford to do this for truth's sake, Christ's sake, or love of souls, that if they made a real earnest effort I would take up a collection for them myself, giv them every cent, and if it did not amount to good pay for the time expended I would add $10 from my own pocket; but as usual no shepherd appeared to defend his flock. One gentleman, after asking some questions and declaring that although he had listened to all three lectures he was still somewhat of a Christian, said the cowardice of the ministry in failing to accept my very kind and liberal offer shook his faith, if not in Christianity, at least in the Christian ministry.

I endeavored to comfort the friend with the assurance that, when they were sure I was far away, when in their coward castles, they would annihilate me in grand style. He replied that was just what he objected to; one of the ministers whom he had urged to accept my offer told him he intended to answer me a week or two after I was gone.

The Market Hall is owned by the city and rents for $35 per night, but the city Solons had rented it to church folks for $10 per night. The Freethought Society applied for its use at same rates, and as they comprise some of the most respected and influential citizens, are an organized body, and an election was near, the city fathers voted them use of the hall at same rates as church folks.

The Freethought Society of Vancouver should own a hall of their own, and hav regular science schools on Sundays, social and ball every month, cultivate musical and dramatic ability of its members, all do all they can, and never leave their own share of the work or cost to be borne by the willing burden-bearers.

The cause of Liberalism is making good headway in British Columbia, and in no place has it better prospects than in the thriving city of Vancouver.

Question 3555. A minister a few days ago, preaching in a church which I attended, used this exact expression: "Stephen Girard, in the establishment of Girard College, did everything he could to make it thoroughly Infidel." He then quoted the clause in Girard's will forbidding any priest, minister, or missionary ever being connected with its management, or even admitted as visitors, and asserted, using these very words, that "the college never prospered until a Christian minister was elected president." Is there anything to show that Girard purposed the establishment of an Infidel college? Has there ever been or is there now a minister at the head of the college, or represented on the board of instructors?

Answer. The presidents of Girard College from its foundation hav been these:

1. Alexander Dallas Bache, a descendant of Franklin, Professor of Natural Philosophy and Chemistry in University of Pennsylvania. The college did not go into operation under him. He visited the European educational institutions in its interest, and published his observations. Died as chief of the United States coast survey.
2. Hon. Joel Jones, well known as a judge in Philadelphia.
3. William H. Allen, LL.D.
4. (Colonel Richard S ?) Smith.
5. William H. Allen, LL.D.
6. Adam H. Fetterolf, LL.D.

Dr. Allen's presidency was very long and wise. He was an honored layman of the Methodist Episcopal church. None of these gentlemen was a minister. So far as we can ascertain no minister has ever been upon the board of directors. The rules in regard to the admission of ministers even to the grounds are strictly kept. The officers hav many ministerial friends, but no one of them, so far as we can find, and our opportunities to know are good, has ever invited a minister to enter his house or the grounds. The rule is to call these persons to the lodge at the entrance, and a few minutes hav to suffice for a nephew, brother-in-law, pastor, or friend. Dr. Allen once found on the grounds a minister who had been a pupil in the college, and promptly conducted him out. No doubt there hav been occasionally ministers who think it a clever thing to enter under false colors, but we hope such lack of honor is extremely rare. The writer, though greatly interested in Girard College, and acquainted with many of its graduates, and though having the children of friends there, and very curious to visit it, has never considered it compatible with a proper sense of honor to do so.

Services are held on Sunday, but always conducted by lay speakers. If anyone should so far forget the proprieties of the place as to become a propagator of any particular form of religion, or the assailant of any, or of any form of non-religion, his services would be speedily dispensed with. When we inquire into Girard's intentions, we can only judge by his actions. Girard had a pew in a church, and required the attendance of nephews or nieces who were living in his house. There is still, or was a short time ago, living one annuitant under his will, Mrs. Amelia G. Taylor. Among many incidents, in conversation with a pupil of the college, she said that Mr. Girard said that "he did not believe in any particular form of religion, but if he ever should make any profession it would be Quakerism."

In the college religious services are held, morning prayers at 8, afternoon at 4, with singing—not in the afternoon on Saturdays and holidays. On Sunday they are held morning and afternoon, with short addresses by laymen, say, twenty minutes; the afternoon address omitted in June, July, and August. There are also short readings in lower sections, with reading and prayer at retiring.

The object of Girard, who as a Freethinking Frenchman was a great admirer of Voltaire's political and religious writings, was simply to train the pupils in the principles of morality, leaving them afterward to choose their own religion; therefore it was that he provided by will that no ecclesiastic, missionary, or minister of any sect is to hold any connection with the college, or be admitted to the premises even as a visitor; but he made a special request that the officers of the institution should instruct the pupils in the principles of morality. The management of the college has assumed in general that a belief in an all-wise and just and merciful God is essential to morality; but the will has been adhered to as respects the letter and the restrictions of Mr. Girard.

From the foregoing it appears that if any minister made such a statement as the question contains he uttered what he could not know to be true, and what was actually false.

News and Notes.

Southern California is a paradise now. Soft winds are blowing, bright skies are shining, fleecy clouds roll over the splendid blue, but no storm is in their silvery depths. The mountains are wonderfully lustrous against the glorious sky, and the vast plains, ribboned with sparkling streams and luxuriant with grove and orchard, extend like the floor of an enormous palace. It is "the joy of life" indeed in this golden land. Flowers of every variety are in bloom.

San Diego, like a queen city, fronts the sea that rolls its endless wealth upon the circling shore. The heart of Liberalism beats here too in rhythm with the music of the unchained billows.

On Sunday evening, November 15th, Louis Opera House is again crowded, and I discourse upon "The Bible and Modern Thought." The audience was thoroughly appreciativ of radical ideas.

Monday morning I begin my week's route from San Diego to Los Angeles. Santa Ana is the first point. Here is where Colonel Baker, of the Santa Ana Standard, makes things interesting for orthodoxy. He says what he thinks is the truth every time, and the people like it, and even those who are struck with holy horror read his lively columns. He likes to hav the Freethought lecturer come around, and always givs him a hearty clasp of the hand, and advertises without money and without price the gospel of the good time coming.

Hope Ranch is glittering also, where my friend D. Edson Smith liv̆s in happy tranquillity. "Ten Acres Enough" is the title of one of his instructiv articles, and he givs a practical illustration of what ten acres can produce in that lovely country. His home is a little paradise. It seemed so to me indeed, as out of the dust of travel I came to it on that sunny morning. The beautiful fruit trees are upon every side, and the squashes are so big that it took the united efforts of Mr. Smith and myself to lift some of them into the wagon. In this rural felicity one can enjoy life with a large margin of leisure and beauty. Mr. Smith is abreast of all reforms. He is a valuable contributor to the press. It is a wonder how he gets time to write so much. He is a Farmers' Alliance worker, and is organizing that party in Southern California, and sometimes makes two speeches a day in advocacy of his cause. It is a pleasure to meet this spirited ally and to spend a day at Hope Ranch. It makes the heart beat higher in the warm delightful sunshine, and amid the delicious music of the trees. Mrs. Smith is equally intelligent and interested in radical advance, and so amid the bloom of nature I find the summons of the "world's great field of battle."

I hav a good audience Monday evening, and a responsiv one. I find improvement each time I come to this point. Mr. H. A. Newman is our stanch supporter. He devotes himself to the success of the meeting, and is a generous contributor. I meet many friends of the old time, and am satisfied that notwithstanding every drawback Freethought is on the forward move.

Tuesday morning there is a conference of the clergymen of the county at Santa Ana. I am invited to attend and did so. I thought possibly there might be a chance for debate, but the talk was entirely one-sided, and there was no room for the Infidel. The first paper read was a tremendous onslaught on the church of Rome. This was good so far. It demonstrated the bitter antagonism of the supreme church of the Christian religion to the common schools. I was not sorry to see Christians fight among themselvs. Therein is the safety of the republic. But I could not help noticing how feeble in logic is the opposition of the Protestant churches to Rome. They do not seem to hav any basis of action—no point whence an effectual attack might be made. It is Rome or reason. What is between must go to the wall when the final grand combat is on. The Protestants do not protest enough. They want to exercise authority. To this I object. When the pope is overthrown Christianity is ended. It has no further function. A paper was read on the relations of the church to reform. It was not a very vital paper. It simply said, the church must leave politics and "preach the gospel." Well, what is the gospel? That question was unanswered.

Really the discussion by these clergymen of the mighty questions of the day was tame indeed. It was like the talk of children. It was "words, words, words," after the fashion of Hamlet. Not a stalwart thought was expressed. The great world was heaving and tumbling outside in enormous force, but these ministers did not seem to know anything about it. They launched their paper boats on a tiny inlet, where scarcely a breath was felt of the real universe.

In the afternoon, by the kindness of Mrs. H. A. Newman I was driven over to Anaheim. Mr. S. Littlefield arranged for our lecture here. I find quite a Liberal element. I was pleased to meet with Leonard Parker and his wife. Again the roses bloom. Life sweeps on with sunshine and shadow, with memory and with hope. Over the soft dear stars of night the morning flings its radiant fires.

I hav a fair audience; meet old friends at Anaheim, and I hope to come again to this fruitful land. Anaheim is a quiet place at present. Yet the country round about is in vigorous growth. The warmth of the sun is refreshed by breezes from the sea. Almost anything can be raised in this section. It is an "all-round" country. Not only fruits of every variety, but grain and vegetables and grass, are abundantly produced. Mr. Littlefield has planted ninety acres to orange trees, and sixty acres to walnut trees. They are in splendid condition. In a few years these lands will giv an income of $10,000. The real property of California is now coming—the cultivation of its soil. The "boom cities" present a melancholy appearance; but groves and orchards are springing everywhere into existence, and from these shall come the wealth and enterprise that will hav no retreating tide.

Mr. W. M. McFadden was chairman of the meeting at Anaheim. Mrs. S. Littlefield contributed a beautiful bouquet, which gave its "silent music" to the occasion. Mr. McFadden has a contest on hand which I hope will help settle a most important question. The Bible is read with great elaboration in the school his children attend. The teacher reads a verse, and then has the whole school repeat it after him. The trustees indorse the teacher. Mr. McFadden proposes to take the matter to the courts. If so, a decision of the supreme court of the state will be the result.

From Anaheim, Wednesday, November 18th, I hurry on to Los Angeles. By a mistake of the mails no arrangements are made for a lecture. However, I see Vass and Foley, hav a good dinner with them, meet J. E Clark and other friends, and arrange for a lecture Monday, November 30th, and I know I shall hav a liberal attendance in this splendid city.

I push on to Monrovia and meet a cordial welcome at the home of W. A. Chess. The Chess brothers, whom I met here four years ago, are now scattered. One is in Butte City and one in Portland, but W. A. Chess holds the fort here, through varied fortunes, and is ready to lend a hand. He arranges for the lecture, and by his earnest work it is a great success. I thought Monrovia quite an orthodox town. It has six churches. When I was here the first time it rained tremendously and I had no audience, and did not lecture. It was rather discouraging. The clouds rolled up in masses this time and it looked as if I would hav the same experience. Sunshine, however, prevailed; but would anybody come to the Freethought lecture even if it was fine weather? It was an experiment. Somebody thought if we did hav an audience it would be a sanctimonious one—that there would not be a ripple of laughter nor a cheer from beginning to end. However, the meeting was a happy disappointment. The hall was filled with ladies and gentlemen and the applause was exhilarating. I hav never had a more appreciativ hearing. Monrovia wheels into line and from this moment on Freethought occupies a position of respect and influence.

Monrovia is a handsome residence city. It lies along the foothills about twelve hundred feet above the sea. The air is brilliant. The mountains tower in splendor and variety. The wide valley spreads to the sea, which makes a white lustrous rim to the varied magnificence of the landscape. The oranges produced in this section are of the first quality. There is no frost.

I was pleased to meet with Mrs. Annette Nye and her family, and to enjoy her hospitality. She is now in the ranks of THE TRUTH SEEKER, a Liberal and a Spiritualist, and in sympathy with the great reforms of the day, both for man and woman. I find many friends in Monrovia. I am sure of a generous welcome here at any time. Mr. Chess's persistent labors hav produced excellent results.

I am due at Savannah Friday night. We drive over, amid the delicious sunset light, through long avenues of trees. The sun sinks in dazzling glory, and leaves behind, from horizon to zenith, an intense glare, which makes a lingering and brilliant twilight against the accumulating shadows of the night. The lanterns are gleaming merrily as we come to Yeary's hotel, in whose hall the lecture is to be given. Mr. and Mrs. Yeary are stanch Liberals. They giv a generous welcome. The hall is filled; good Christians attend, besides Liberals from El Monte and the vicinity. This is the first lecture ever given at this place, and it was well received. The subject was "The Bible." Will H. Baker and J. F. Unruh are our stalwart allies here. They were determined to push the campaign at any cost. Mr. Baker tells me he is going to Langlois, Ore. The Liberals there will find him a true comrade. Mr. John Haddock introduced me at the lecture. Mrs F. D. Buttolph and Mrs. W. R Dodson are on the roll of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The intelligence of the community was well represented in this successful gathering.

Mr. Yeary is an old-timer. He has been in this country forty-one years. He is well known in the state. He never goes back on his colors. He is a Freethinker to the backbone. He freely gave the use of his hall, and Mrs. Yeary generously entertained the speaker, and they promised to do the same to all Liberal lecturers who happen along. This is a good outlook for the pioneer worker.

I am at Orange to night, Saturday. This concludes a pretty good week's work. I hav been greatly encouraged. I hav had one of the best trips yet. The people come out. The lecture field never gave more promis than at present.

Nov. 21, 1891. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Cause in Michigan.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: No doubt a few words from a disinterested person will be of interest to your many readers. While I am a disinterested person yet I hav been quite interested and observing. When we look at the condition of things at present and meditate upon things of the past we can truly feel encouraged at the progress Rationalism is making as against that of pure Bible doctrins. One has a hard task before him to find a preacher or lay member who places much confidence in the strict interpretation of the Bible. It would not be difficult for a Rationalist, or, in fact, the whole body of them, to gain admittance into the churches of the present time.

Were I to make application to join a church, however spiritual it may be, I would be asked whether I believed the Bible to be the product of God's mind; whether I believed in the Bible account of pristin purity and the fall; whether I believed all men were sinners; whether I believed in the Bible idea of redemption through an incarnated son of God; whether I believed Christ was a son of God only begotten by the Holy Ghost; whether I believed in any "good works" (Bible works, of course); whether I would take the "word of God" as "my man of counsel," provided they were in doubt as to whether a negativ answer would close my purse and influence against them.

They, with a few exceptions, hav acceded to the Rationalists' declaration that there is nothing in a total change in the moral nature that will make one hate what the "worldling" loves, cease to talk as he does, cease to look as he does, and banish the ill feeling and prejudices he once possessed. They tell us God intended we should enjoy all things he made—that there is nothing in the old doctrin of self-denial. They hav expunged it from their creeds, and say, Drink and be merry, for to-morrow we die. The Nicolatians in the first century discovered the erroneousness of the self-denial and "good works" doctrin and the churches are wisely taking up the battle-cry against those who are so far behind the times and still inculcate the idea.

They, with the Rationalist, believe that the feelings they enjoy are simply an unmistakable evidence that they are all right; and these feelings are reliable, though the whole Bible contradicts, thus proving the absurdity of Rom. xii, 2. They hav also exploded the imposition upon men, that those who do what Christ enjoins will be satisfied—they do not desire anything the "worldling" gives. They superficially condemn gambling and its attendants, yet they will become enthusiastic over a horse-race. They denounce the lottery business as of the devil, yet they will engage in a sanctified church lottery with all the spirituality they possess.

I hav taken special pains to look up the true state of affairs. Within the last five years I hav traveled over several states, selling books (Testaments of course), that I might the better become acquainted with the workings of the churches as a general thing. I took special pains to examin them in every detail, and can truthfully say that the condition of the first community visited was a perfect representation of every other one. To be sure, some communities had persons of such holy dispositions and stability of character not found in others, but the opposition, prejudices, and hatred were universally prevalent.

Several years ago I came into possession of several tracts, among which was one, "The House We Liv In," being a statement of the faith and practice of a small denomination. I had never heard of these people before, and could not find out where any of them lived. I asked a "man of God" where I could find some of them. He told me it was folly to go so far to hunt them up; that they were so foolish they thought they ought to do things as they found them in the Bible, and had not the wisdom to do the more objectionable things in a spiritual way; that is, they could not take advantage of the part of the Bible we do not really feel like doing.

This opposition of that "man of God" only strengthened my curiosity more than ever, and I finally found the people holding to the faith enunciated in the aforesaid tract. I found them all generous to a fault. I learned their ways, studied up their practices, and can really say I felt at home among them, though I was no more interested in their doctrins than in any other. I often get into trouble with them, as they are wonderfully defensiv when it comes to dealing with "God's word," and I can say in all candor that they are the only people of whom I hav heard that Rationalism is in direct opposition to.

You can go to the Baptist, Presbyterian, Methodist, United Brethren, Lutheran, Disciple, or Congregationalist denominations and tackle them on the Bible and they will all stand up for its divine inspiration, and tell us they take it as a whole; but when you come to a Dunkard he will not only tell you what the rest tell you, but he will say he will accept it in detail as well as a whole.

When you want to whip the Dunkards you can enlist almost every denomination on earth and giv it to them in any shape you wish. They literally despise the Dunkards. I hav attended several of their love-feasts. They hav tables enough in the church-house to accommodate all of their own belief present. They are spread with soup made from bread and the broth of beef, beef, and bread. Then they wash one another's feet—the men the men's feet, and the women those of their own sex. They then eat the meal before them, after which they take the bread and wine.

Though you read this in the Bible (so they hav not added to it) I hav heard the severest criticisms and strongest proofs against this work made by very devoted men to the Bible. Different times I thought I was in company with Rationalists and would express my views in opposition to this part of "God's word" and they would amen them with a zeal worthy the cause. You can easily imagin my surprise when I found these of my faith were Christians and believers in the whole Bible.

Then when the men meet, they salute each other with a kiss, and the women also as do the male part of the church. This is also in the Bible, but I hav heard ministers—men of God—ridicule this and say they would not kiss a man for $20; and another said if he could kiss the sisters he would like it, but that he would not kiss a man—a brother not excepted—for a kingdom. Now, with such holy leaders, so confident in the truthfulness of the Bible, to lead, you cannot go amiss in guessing what support Rationalism got from their devoted followers.

They do not dress like the world, or unbelievers, prostitutes, etc. The women wear a neat sunbonnet, and plain clothing, with a white cap or veiling under the bonnet. The men wear wide-rimmed hats with standing coat-collar. It is almost incredible to hear of the Christian mothers using the language about their daughters who choose to join this fraternity that they do. I hav heard a story here of a Christian man and woman with their only daughter and her husband going to meeting one night with the latter's conveyance. The language used against that daughter and son-in-law was very strong, and is seldom equaled by those less favored by God. They were followed by three men sufficiently close to hear. The mother accused the son-in-law of everything and ran these Dunkards down to the level of devils, hypocrits, etc, and wound up by saying that before she would belong to his church and wear a bonnet she would go to hell, as horrid a place as the Bible says it is. When she spoke for Christ she felt so good; the love of God was shed abroad in her heart, and she would do anything for Christ because he had done so much for her.

So it is wherever I go—wonderful opposition to these people. One man said that were it not for the law there would be more Dunkard funerals than there are, for when these children join the Dunkards the love of God would swell up and derange their Christian mothers and fathers and the spirit would inspire them to murder their wayward daughters so they would not do those naughty things in the Bible.

In conclusion I will say, I am terribly bothered and cannot decide whether we Infidels are Christians or whether Christians are Infidels. J. TAYLOR.

English Notes.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKERS: Freethought work is not without its interesting incidents. Sometimes our workers are more enthusiastic than discreet, and in their enthusiasm do those things which we graver ones can scarcely commend. Still we must make some allowance for untrained minds feeling a desire for revenge against their unprincipled Christian enemies. Here is an example of what we hav to contend with, and how our converts occasionally take the law into their own hands. At Finchley, a suburb in the north of London, made famous by Hogarth's painting "The March of the Guards through Finchley," we hav been trying to popularize Freethought views. The result at first was highly satisfactory; but the dear Lord sent down a batch of his lying prophets who declared us all to be immoral beyond imagination, and the people shrank from us like poison. An underhanded persecution set in, and our converts were afraid to go near us for fear of losing their employment. Time, however, wore off the sharp corners of the Christian reproaches and the Freethinkers established themselvs in Finchley. On one occasion Mr. W. J. Ramsey, who shared Holloway jail with Mr. G W. Foote and Mr. Kemp, was announced to giv the Sunday lecture. By some preconcerted arrangement, apparently, the local Church Army and Salvation Army bands kept up a succession of instrumental dins, so that Ramsey had no alternativ but to stay his discourse. Then the sequel. Our leader in those parts, who is a navvy who has raised himself into the position of employing other navvies, introduced a small barrel-organ into the harmonic gatherings. It was no use for the allied bands to contend against that; and for three weeks the Finchley outdoor services were the chief amusement for the villagers. Now came one Sunday's rest to see how the Armies would behave themselvs. That was followed by another effort to speak and I went down at an unexpected time last Sunday. News of my arrival was swiftly carried round the suburb; and when the trap drew up to the preaching ground the Church Army was already there, singing, praying, brassbanding to their hearts' content. Within a foot of my trap a Christian converted fighter with a tremendous voice railed at us and our teachings. Babel was reproduced. How I managed it I scarcely know, but for three quarters of an hour I shouted over the heads of the tumultuous assembly and addressed a fairly large number who listened as attentivly as they could to their first Freethought lecture in that out-of-the-way corner of Finchley. This week my voice is all sixes and sevens from the tremendous strain it underwent. As compensation, however, tracts and thoughts were distributed where they are sure to bring forth useful fruit.

Last Sunday evening it was my good fortune to listen to a lecture in the Finsbury Park hall, which not only threw considerable light on the Theosophic question, but, if true, gave it a somewhat gloomy coloring. Mr. Crisfield is a practical hypnotist, for medical purposes, at our London-on-Sea, Brighton. For several years he has treated his patients with the aid of hypnotism and his wife has assisted him as a "masseuse." The result is that the doctor has not only had experience in the art, but that experience has enabled him to giv both entertaining and very useful lectures upon the various phases of hypnotism. To one such lecture we were invited last Sunday. After a learned disquisition, which, for accuracy's sake, he read, Mr. Crisfield invited some of his audience to mount the platform, and then mesmerised such as cared to ascend. This part of the show was interesting enough, and by the aid of the explanations already given, equally instructiv to the more thoughtful portion of his audience. However, Mr. Crisfield clearly pointed out that hypnotism ought not to be used for the purpose of ridiculous exhibitions. Such things ought to be suppressed. For medical purposes hypnotism was a boon and should be used more than it is. On the other hand, by training one's body to subjection to hypnotic influences one or an audience of fifty persons can be brought under the lasting spell of the operator for good or evil. Such, at least, I understood him to teach. That most extraordinary phase of mesmerism, post-hypnotic suggestion, renders patients capable of believing that they can see, whilst in their otherwise normal waking condition, those very things which they believed they saw whilst in the hypnotic state; and Mr. Crisfield seemed to think that having reduced herself to that condition, Mrs. Besant had believed to receive the Mahatmas letters as a matter of fact; and he also believed that now Madame Blavatsky is dead, there is no one who can release these people from their present state. A hypnotizer would seem to hav power of his patients to such an extent that if he suggests that no one else shall hav power of hypnotism over them, no other hypnotizer is able to influence them for good or evil. My knowledge of the subject is far too tiny to indorse Mr. Crisfield in any way, but if he be right in his ideas and suitable patients, often those of strongest will and keenest intellects, can be made subject to post-hypnotic suggestions and made to believe what their master tells them to believe, it is one of the most melancholy things that I remember to hav learned. Of course Mr. Crisfield only uses the art in a general way for the removal of neuralgic pains, sleeplessness, indigestion, and so on; and when he hypnotizes people for amusing purposes he puts it out of other practitioners' power to do so without his consent. Mr. Crisfield is an out-and-out Freethinker who has worked hard for the cause in Brighton, and is a total disbeliever in Spiritualism of any kind, being a stanch Materialist.

Most of our American friends will be familiar with the name of Robert Forder. Perhaps that good man does not come to the front so much as do others; but he certainly has done an enormous work for Freethought since he has been secretary of the National Secular Society. Mr. Forder is now approaching middle age, that age when men hav had a fair experience of the world and are yet endowed with their largest portion of mental and bodily vigor. At such period of life good men try to be useful to their fellows as well as to themselvs, and if they hav been careful, plodding men, they are generally in a social position which enables them to leave their business occasionally in other hands whilst they help a little in works of public kind. Our old friend has made a move in this direction and has wisely determined to seek a seat on the London school board to repair in some measure, if he be elected, the loss the Progressiv party must sustain by the decision of Mrs. Besant to sacrifice the poor children of London on her altar of Theosophy. That Mr. Forder will blow no uncertain sound may be gathered from his program, which I append.

LONDON SCHOOL BOARD.

To the Ratepayers of the Finsbury Division.

Ladies and Gentlemen:

I beg to offer myself as a Progressiv candidate.

Elementary education having been made, by law, compulsory and free, it should, as a logical consequence, be of a purely secular character. I shall, if elected, strongly advocate the exclusion of all religious teaching from the board schools.

With regard to the general policy of the school board, I am in favor of the provision of first-class buildings; the maintenance of a sufficient and efficient staff of teachers; spacious playgrounds, to be open to the children of the neighborhood at all reasonable times; management of the schools to be entirely free from sectarian influence; and the proper and careful administration of the ratepayers' money.

I am strongly in favor of paying trade union rates of wages for all work done for the board; and, whenever possible, the labor-day for all employees of the board should be limited to eight hours.

I am also in favor of the extension of evening schools, with an attractiv and practical course of studies.

My public work during the last thirty years in all movements of a Progressiv character will, I hope, justify me in asking your confidence and support.

ROBERT FORDER.

Lectures and Meetings.

MRS. MATTIE KREKEL will spend the month of December lecturing in Texas and the following four months in Kansas, Nebraska, and Iowa. Her address this month is 363 Third street, Portland, Oregon; after that, care of Mrs. J. W. Grit, 448 Bryan street, Dallas, Texas.

W. S. BELL will lecture at Creston, Ia., December 1st; North Bend, Neb., 3d, 4th, 5th; Friend, Neb., 7th; Dallas, Tex., 12th, 13th; Flatonia, Tex., 16th, 17th; San Antonio, Tex., 20th; El Paso, Tex., 23d, 24th, 25th; Phœnix, Ariz., 27th, 28th, 29th; San Pasquale, Cal., January 2d, 3d.

S. P. PUTNAM'S lecture appointments in California: Oakdale, December 5th, 6th; Lodi, 12th; Stockton, 13th; Gridley, 15th, 16th, 17th. Mr. Putnam will lecture the first four Sundays of January in San Francisco on "The Evolutions of a Century." Subject of first lecture, "Evolutions—Theological and Religious;" of second lecture, "Liberalism, Spiritualism, and Infidelity;" of third lecture, "Industrial Evolutions;" of fourth lecture, "Political Evolutions." January 29th there will be a grand Paine celebration at Union Square Hall. On the following Saturday and Sunday, January 30th and 31st, will be held the state convention.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH'S lecture appointments are as follows: November 15th, Beloit, Kan; 16th, 17th, 18th, Industry; 23d, 24th, Doniphan; 26th, 27th, Eagle, Neb.; 29th, Hamburg, Ia; December 6th, Ottumwa; 16th, Aurora, Ill.; 21st, 22d, Lexington; 23d, 24th, Strasburg; 27th, 28th, Centralia; 30th, 31st, Waterloo, Ind.; January 10th, Columbus, O; 11th, 12th, Shreve; 24th, Kent; 27th, 28th, Farmdale; 29th, Pittsburgh, Pa.

J. CLEGG WRIGHT, the Infidel Spiritualist orator, will speak at the Manhattan Liberal Club, 220 East 15th street, on Friday evening, December 4th. His subject is "Individualism vs. Socialism—the real point of conflict in process of civilization." Mr. Wright is a fervid speaker, of whom the heretical Spiritualists think a good deal, and will no doubt giv the Club something to debate. December 11th the mother of Lillian Russell will describe the "Evolution of Reason." Following Mrs Leonard, December 18th, Miss Mai Fai will talk about "Liberal Liberty."

MRS. M. A. FREEMAN writes: "On November 14th Dr. Juliet H. Severance gave an address before the Chicago Secular Union to a large and appreciativ audience. The subject was, 'The True Healing Art,' and as usual she handled it with force and ability. She was extremely happy in her illustrations, comparing drug medication to the vicarious atonement, and she said of the homeopathists that they are about like the Unitarians, but that the danger was that one taking a little medicin or a little religion was apt to indulge in more, that there was a constant tendency in either case to increase the dose. The doctor, much to the satisfaction of her friends, is regaining her old strength and is ready to answer calls to lecture in adjacent states. Liberals should remember the work of this brave reformer, and write her for particulars at No. 2 Warren ave., Chicago, Ill."

ANDREW HOGG, of Cincinnati, Ohio, writes to us under date of November 25th, as follows: "A number of Liberals met in Eureka Hall, northeast corner of Ninth and Walnut streets, Sunday, 15th instant, to endeavor to effect an organization of Freethinkers in this city. A meeting will be held on Sunday, 29th instant, in the same place at 3 o'clock P.M., to hav the organization perfected on a solid basis, and should this meet the eye of any persons in or around this city interested in this movement for the destruction of superstition and spread of the principles of Universal Mental Liberty it is expected that they will join us in this much-needed movement. When regular meetings are held we will hope to hav a little space in THE TRUTH SEEKER reserved for notice of the same if possible. Should anyone not see this notice in time to join us on the foregoing date the undersigned will be glad to see or hear from them at any time." Mr. Hogg's address is 215 West 7th st.

The Bible in the Schools.

At first thought the reading of the Bible in the public schools appears to be a very harmless, if not beneficial, practice. Those among the laity who favor it do not, as a rule, intend any infringement of others' rights or the perversion of any of the functions of the common schools. They believe that the Bible inculcates good morals, that religious instruction is necessary to the young, and that, therefore, the reading of the Bible in the schools would be beneficial.

But this conclusion is a non sequitur. It does not follow from their premises. A book which contains good maxims may also contain bad ones, and its good influence may thus be counteracted. Religious instruction might be beneficial to the young, and yet this instruction might not be most advantageously or most properly given in the public schools.

There are several numerous and influential classes who object to the reading of the Bible in the public schools, and for various reasons. Among these classes are the Catholics, Adventists, and Freethinkers. The Catholics and their reasons will be first noticed.

It will perhaps be conceded by all that the Catholic is the oldest and most numerous Christian denomination represented in the United States. Its literature extends back to and includes the writings of what are known as the "fathers" of the church, from the time of the apostles to the present day. To it hav belonged, and in its bosom hav died, nine-tenths of all the Christians who hav ever lived. What it may hav to say on the subject of religion is therefore entitled to some respect, and what it may ask in the matter of collectiv or individual rights is worthy of some consideration on the part of the people who compose the sovereignty of the United States. A few brief statements alone will be necessary to show the position of this church on the subject.

"Examin the Bibles promiscuously distributed in school-rooms, and it will be found that certain portions are soiled with much use, and sometimes absolutely worn away by lecherous-minded youths; particular passages are marked to aid in more convenient reference for others; a special delight is taken by many lads to call the attention of the female element in mixed schools to certain verses, expressions, etc., whose reading and study produces the utmost disorder in both sexes" (Freeman's Journal and Catholic Register, June 20, 1891).

"The Old Testament is not a religious book. It is rather moral than religious, but it is the most immoral book in print" (Statement of a Catholic citizen of Hartford).

"Many things are narrated in scripture, not as they really happened, but according to the opinion prevalent at the age of the writer" (St. Jerome).

These statements impugn the morality, accuracy, and reliability of the Bible as a whole. This church also opposes religious instruction in the schools because such instruction is usually given by Protestants out of the Protestant Bible, and they do not believe that they ought to be taxed to pay for the giving of such instruction to their children as they do not wish them to receive. As we proceed we shall find that other objectors present substantially the same views.

Noah Webster, of lexicographical fame, says: "In no respect does the present version of the scriptures require amendment more than in the use of many words and phrases which cannot now be uttered, especially in promiscuous company, without violence to decency; further, many words and phrases are so offensiv, especially to females, as to create a reluctance in young persons to attend Bible classes and schools in which they are required to read passages which cannot be repeated without a blush, and containing words which, on other occasions, a child can not utter without rebuke."

The vulgarity referred to by Mr. Webster extends not to the words alone, but in many instances to the narrativ itself, as witnessed by Gen. xxxviii, 2 Sam. xiii, Judges xix, 2 Jam. xvi, Gen. xxxv, etc.; and has led to the adoption of lesson leaves, in which the obscene passages are omitted, in nearly all of the modern Sunday-schools.

Rev. Charles A. Briggs, professor of biblical theology in the Union Theological Presbyterian Seminary of New York, says: "There are errors in the scriptures which no one has been able to explain away, and the theory that they were not in the original text is sheer assumption, upon which no man can rest with certainty."

Rev. Daniel Curry, D.D., Methodist, reviser of Clarke's Commentaries, said a few years ago in a Chicago preachers' meeting that the Old Testament abounded in old wives' fables, which ought to be discarded.

Thomas Jefferson said in a speech before the general assembly of Virginia in 1785, that "to compel a man to furnish contributions of money for the propagation of opinions which he disbelieves, is sinful and tyrannical."

The New York Independent says: "Those who insist that some species of religious instruction shall be incorporated into our public school system, may not intend the result; yet they are taking just the course most likely to destroy the system altogether, since they demand of it what it cannot consistently do. Secular instruction is the utmost limit to which the system can be reasonably extended."

The Wisconsin supreme court has recently decided that the reading of the Protestant Bible in the public schools constitutes sectarian instruction; and of course the reading of the Catholic, or any other version, would be equally so.

The Adventists are opposed to the reading of the Bible in the public schools, because, according to their views, the state has nothing to do with religion. The civil law and the ecclesiastical law, in their estimation, hav nothing in common. The word "civil" comes from the Latin civitas, meaning "city," ancient states deriving their names from capital cities; while ecclesiastical law is for the government of the church. As President James Madison said: "Religion is not in the purview of human government. Religion is essentially distinct from government and exempt from its cognizance. A connection between them is injurious to both." The sentiments of President U. S. Grant were similar. He said: "Leave the matter of religion to the family altar, the church, and the private school, supported entirely by private contribution. Keep the state and the church forever separate."

The phenomenal growth of Freethought, which chronicles a seventy-five per cent increase of adherents in ten years, while the various churches hav only gained from naught to six per cent; the intelligence of its people, in whose ranks are such men as Charles Darwin, Herbert Spencer, John W. Draper, Thomas Huxley, Ernest Haeckel, John Tyndall, Alex. Von Humboldt, and scores of others of the world's leaders in science and philosophy; and the fact that the founders of American liberty, the pioneers of the antislavery movement, and the agitators of nearly every reform, come from its ranks, giv to the Secular demands of the Freethinkers of the world a prestige which rises above the consideration of numbers.

The Freethinkers of the world demand a purely secular education for the reasons already adduced by the Catholics and Adventists; and also because the doctrin of scriptural infallibility, discarded by every educated clergyman in the world, should no longer be allowed to block the progress of scientific knowledge in the schools of this country.

Felix Kuhn, a noted Lutheran minister of Paris and historian of Luther, openly declares that "the old ideas harmonize no more with the requirements of science." Edmund Stapfer, author of a new French translation of the New Testament, says emphatically that among Protestants "it must be confessed in all frankness that the belief in a direct inspiration of the scriptures, making them of authority, has passed its time, and is henceforth no more held. A great number of Protestant Christians, the greatest number probably, still hold the infallibility of the holy books; but theologians do so no more." Rev. Dr. Briggs affirms that "Superstition is no less superstition if it takes the form of bibliolatry. The Bible is no better than a mass-book for stopping a bullet, and is not as good as holy water for putting out a fire." The Unitarian Christian Register says: "Dr. Briggs never uttered a more wholesome truth than when he classed bibliolatry with Mariolatry and other superstitions." Dr. Buckley, editor of the New York Christian Advocate (Methodist), admits that "there are no original manuscripts [of the Bible] in the world; that the translators were in the habit of adding words in the English version to make the sense clear, and that these are generally, but not always, placed in italics; that the manuscripts from which the translations are made differ among themselvs," etc.

Prof. James D. Dana, LL.D., who is said by Rev. Joseph Cook to be the most orthodox geologist in the world, now says that, "Geology proves that there are discrepancies between science and the record; discrepancies with regard to the kinds of plants which made up the first life of the globe, and on some other similar points. If it states these discrepancies and explains them, it does its duty; and it is very certain that any assertions it may make on the subject will be based on well-established facts."

Says the Rev. Mr. Parkhurst, of New York city: "The church has always fought new ideas, never subscribes to a discovery in science until it has to, always widens its conceptions grudgingly and sulkily, and when on the frontier between the known and the unknown it has always behaved as though it were scared. The man who has a new understanding of a thing is always a hated man. No matter what his character may be, no matter how willing he might be to lay down his life for the truth, as he apprehends it, he is a feared and hated man. They always try to kill him. They do it as a part of their religious life."

"When we love our brother for the sake of our brother," says Professor Clifford, "we help all men to grow in the right; but when we love our brother for the sake of somebody else, who is very likely to damn our brother, it very soon comes to burning him alive for his soul's health."

Hardly had the Christian religion become firmly established in the Roman empire when "the emperor Justinian prohibited the teaching of philosophy, and closed its schools in Athens, A.D. 529" (Draper).

Under Valentinian and Valens "every manuscript that could be seized was forthwith burnt. Throughout the East men in terror destroyed their libraries, for fear that some unfortunate sentence contained in any of the books should involve them and their families in destruction. The universal opinion was that it was right to compel men to believe what the majority of society had now accepted as the truth, and, if they refused, it was right to punish them. No one was heard in the dominating party to raise his voice in behalf of intellectual liberty."

"The science of the fathers was essentially founded on the principle that the scriptures contain all knowledge permitted to man" (Idem). St. Augustine was one of the fathers. He asserted that "it is impossible there should be inhabitants on the opposit side of the earth, since no such race is recorded by scripture among the descendants of Adam." Lactantius was another of the fathers who fully believed in the Bible. He asked, "Is it possible that men can be so absurd as to believe that the crops and the trees on the other side of the earth hang downward, and that men hav their feet higher than their heads?" Bruno was burnt by Christian believers in the Bible in the sixteenth century for asserting that the earth turned around. Galileo suffered imprisonment, and only escaped burning for the same cause by recantation. Freethought was their only crime. Vanini, the Italian philosopher, had his tongue cut out and was then burnt alive, in 1619, for daring to use his reason in opposition to the barbarian biblical and patristic cosmogony of his day. And these are but a tithe of the martyrs who suffered death for blessing the world with useful discoveries and inventions, at the hands of those who taught the same religion that is taught to-day.

Luther also, with the open Bible before him, bitterly opposed and ridiculed Copernicus, and thought he had done a smart thing when he had called that immortal philosopher a poor fool. We want our public schools devoted to real knowledge, to science as opposed to superstition. If people want to teach their children about the ghosts and hobgoblins, the nymphs and fairies, the sylphs and satyrs—things which exist only in the imagination of the ignorant and moonstruck—let them teach them these things at home or at church; and if they are afraid that these gauzy films of theology will be dispelled by an acquaintance with the facts of science, let them forswear education altogether. People used to shrink in terror from the exhibition of "God's thunderbolt"—the lightning—and execrate Franklin and Morse, whose discoveries now giv us the telegraph and electric railways. When an eclipse occurred the churches and monasteries used to be crowded with worshipers, praying their God to drive the devil off the sun; but now scientific men travel thousands of miles to observe eclipses and transits of planets, and thus add to the world's knowledge. A few centuries ago the windmill and the printing-press were called the inventions of the devil; and Governor Berkeley of Virginia said he hoped the new colonies in America would not hav any free schools or printing-presses for a hundred years, because learning brought heresy and printing divulged it, and the pious governor dreaded heresy worse than he dreaded ignorance. But by and by Thomas Jefferson came along to make old Virginia proud, and told the people to "question with boldness even the existence of a God, because, if there be one, he must more approve the homage of reason than of blindfolded fear."

My religious neighbors are now telling me that it is wrong to explode dynamite to bring rain. They say God can only make rain, and all scientific appliances are both useless and sinful. This shows me why Professor Draper wrote his "Conflict Between Science and Religion." It is only another feebler manifestation of the spirit of superstition that crucified science and, when powerful, burnt scientists in the past. The clergy who are better informed owe it to truth and their consciences to help eradicate superstition from our public schools, that the rising generation may not hav their youthful minds weighted down in their search after truth.

My Lecture Trip.

My lectures in Leadville were attended with unusual success. Each succeeding night my audiences were considerably augmented, and they gave way to a burst of greeting when I ascended the platform. The miners are an exceedingly Liberal class of men, whose effusiv and generous hospitality strikes very forcibly upon one who has been trained in the stiff customs and habits of our Eastern cities. I spoke in the city hall, and my lectures were received with enthusiasm. On Sunday night a resolution was drawn up and offered to the meeting, condemning the action of the Sabbatarian organizations throughout the country in their attempts to close the World's Exposition on Sundays. The resolution was first read to the audience, and its adoption was moved by Louis Hoebel, seconded by A. D. Searl. Mr. W. Booth (vice-president) then put it to the meeting, and it was carried unanimously, the audience also pledging themselvs to use every means in their power to secure the opening of the Exposition upon each and every Sunday during its continuance. It was also decided to send a copy of the resolution to the state commissioners and to the local directory of the Fair.

During my stay here I was the honored guest of Captain Searl and family, who did their utmost to giv me a good impression of the Rocky mountains and their inhabitants, and I am sure that I can never thank them sufficiently for their extreme kindness to me. The captain has figured quite largely in the historical achievements of his country. An engineer by trade, he has served with great usefulness in several military expeditions. He was sent out to Utah to survey portions of the territory with a view to effecting a gentile settlement therein, hoping by this means to secure the overthrow of polygamy in that country. His orders were to found two colonies, the first of which he was to name "Unevah," meaning "one wife," and the second "Virtoso," meaning "virtuous man." But owing to the death of the promoter of the scheme, the project fell through, and now the only use he has made of the names is that he has bestowed them upon two grandchildren, also giving the name "Virtoso" to a mine on the hills and "Unevah" to a ranch of his a few miles from Leadville. I accepted an invitation to dine with Mr. W. Booth on the Sunday (a prominent business man), and in the afternoon an attempt was made to drive as far as the lakes on the mountain-sides to inspect the fish hatcheries. But we never reached there; it was too cold for Mr. Booth to continue the drive, so he turned back, although the ladies declared that it was not the least bit cold, and I did not know whether to coincide with Mr. Booth or the ladies, but I must confess that my face was blue before I got back. A large number of the audience signed the constitution of the new Union at the close of the meetings, with the intention of becoming members thereof, and now the prospects are that a good, strong, and earnest Freethought organization will be established in Leadville. They hav splendid opportunities. May they utilize them to the highest and may success attend their efforts to encourage mankind

> To worship in no temple of wood or of stone,
> To a man-made God on a creed contrived throne,
> But ever beneath the blue sky above
> To worship in Nature's great temple of love.

There are quite a number of earnest and well-to-do Liberals in this city, and I was very pleased indeed to meet for the first time such as the gallant captain and family, Mr. and Mrs. Booth, Mrs. Denman, Louis Hoebel, J. Henry, and several others. All expressed regrets that my lectures had come to a termination, and I had to promis to visit Leadville again in the near future before I departed.

I left Leadville Wednesday morning (when I commenced my homeward trip) en route for Kansas, where I hav one or two engagements to lecture. My first place in Kansas was Industry, a little agricultural township, situated at a distance of eighteen miles from the railroads. I experienced considerable inconvenience in reaching it, but having made the contract to lecture there, I was in duty bound to fulfill the same. A roundabout ride all day on Sunday brought me to Clay Center, and here I was informed that the rest of my journey would hav to be made in an open mail-cart, which left this town for Industry at 6 A M There was only one alternativ—walk—but as you may naturally suppose I preferred the mail-cart. We got a start about 7:30 A M and this ride will never be forgotten by me. During the whole journey a forty-mile nor'wester was raging, and the biting cold made traveling under these circumstances exceedingly unpleasant. Mentally I had named our Mexican broncos "Deliberation;" at least, this is what seemed to me a most suitable name for them at one time, but an incident occurred which caused me to change my opinion. The driver had occasion to get out to deliver some mail, leaving me in charge of the team. He had scarcely left us when the horses began to manifest an uneasiness. One of them gave me an ominous look, as though he knew that he now had an inexperienced hand to deal with, when suddenly they started off. I cried out "Whoa" to them as hard as I could, but it only seemed to make them go the faster. Finally, with a good deal of pulling and tugging, I brought them to a standstill, and found that they had cleared a barbed-wire fence. There I was with the horses on one side of the fence and myself in the cart on the other. The driver soon came to my assistance, and began to extricate me from my unfortunate predicament, talking to those horses the while in a strain known only to drivers, but which the horses seemed to perfectly understand. Of course I did not assist the driver in his vituperations, but they were exactly my sentiments Finally the little town of Industry hove in sight. and I soon found myself before a warm stove, seated beside a well-filled table in the hospitable home of H. D. Ingraham, whose guest I remained while in this place. This town has a population of about three hundred. The majority of its inhabitants are Liberals. They hav a church in their midst, but owing to a strange feeling characteristic of all Christian churches at present, its doors are closed and now it stands the silent monument of those internal squabbles which seem to permeate the whole Christian world. "How these Christians love each other." I gave two lectures here. Originally I was to hav given three, but our friends persuaded me to forgo one, so as not to injure another lecture which was to be given on Tuesday night. An effort was made by a local sky pilot to injure mine, by arranging a series of prayer-meetings in order to prevent the faithful from falling under the influence of Infidelity, but his efforts were so much wasted energy, for I had by far the greater audience, and which represented the most intelligent and most useful part of the community. My first lecture on "Bible Morality" succeeded in drawing out a good, though erratic criticism by a local physician, Dr. Littlefield. The doctor displayed a habit of wandering from the subject, which necessitated my calling him to order. He charged me with willfully misquoting the Bible, and declared that though the Bible did record the most bloodthirsty crimes, he would defy me to bring forth one passage wherein God sanctioned them. I instantly referred him to Num. xxxi, 1 2; also verse 40 of the same chapter, at the conclusion of which the worthy doctor admitted that God did sanction crime, thereby glaringly contradicting himself and vindicating my position. The outcome of this was a challenge to debate, which was accepted and arranged for Thursday night.

My second lecture drew a larger audience. Again the doctor was present, and though he took copious notes of my statements, he very wisely refrained from making any criticism, thinking, no doubt, once bitten twice shy, which reminded me very forcibly of a remark that I once heard concerning a Liberal lecture, that "At first the fools rush in, but after, angels fear to tread." Considerable interest was aroused in this usually quiet little town; my lectures were the sole topic of conversation, so that the debate between the doctor and myself was looked to with great eagerness. The subject under discussion was, "Is there a God?" the doctor taking the affirmativ, and myself the negativ. Each spoke twice, of one half hour duration. and the doctor was given ten minutes by way of rejoinder to my last speech. Truly I was disappointed in my opponent's attempts at reasoning. Evidently he is not accustomed to rudiments of a Freethought debate. Throughout the whole discussion he displayed a roving disposition; he had no arguments, and his attempted answers were all evasions and assumptions. Upon one occasion he, turning to the audience, said unto them, "You know there is a God, don't you? Of course you do," and that settled it. The greater part of his last address was taken up by reading a long extract from the Bible, another from Josephus, and then he quoted from Thomas Paine. But his closing remarks compelled me to rise with an objection. He had agreed not to introduce any new matter in his last ten minutes, and it was only upon this condition that I gave my consent, for it gave him three speeches to my two; but, notwithstanding this, he began a dissertation upon the idea of immortality; this, together with his equivocations, compelled the chairman—M. H. Price—who had been elected by the audience, to call him to the subject, and further tell him that he must confine himself to the truth. This justified my objections. However, on the whole, the doctor is a very amiable and Liberal-minded man; if all professing Christians were like him, then the task of the Freethought lecturer would be considerably lightened. He does not believe in the union of church and state; he believes in an equal taxation of church property, and indorses several other features of our platform. We shook hands heartily at the conclusion of the debate, and begged me to exchange photographs with him, which was done.

Industry has had a good shaking up now, thanks to worthy efforts of J. B. Wise, who, though somewhat poor in circumstances, takes a decided activ interest in Freethought propaganda, and is willing to do more than his share in effecting it. I was very pleased to meet such a large class of earnest Liberals in this little town, including J. B. Wise, H. D. Ingraham, Dr. Renner, Ike Gibbs, C. Kassebaum, Rudolph Berger, F. Berger, M. H. Price, Joseph Blum, Mr. Brown, and Mr. Petersen. My efforts here were thoroughly satisfactory, and all were well pleased. I next lecture in Doniphan. I am still open for a few dates along my homeward journey, and friends desiring lectures, etc., may address me in care of E. A. Stevens, 498 W. Madison street, Chicago.

An Editorial and an Indignant Protest.

From the Seattle Wash, Press-Times.

It is quite evident that the Anarchists are still as strong and but little more discreet in Chicago to-day than they were just preceding the Haymarket outbreak several years ago.

The Anarchists represent the extreme repression of foreign countries. They come to America from lands where the slightest opposition to the recognized government means imprisonment or banishment. In the place of their nativity they were more than grateful to eke out existence starving, cold, ground down, brutish. The liberty which former association should render priceless is forgotten and despised; the abundance which past beggarly life should magnify into content and happiness these disturbers of society and assassins of order trample under their feet and spurn from them.

There ought to be some way in which these wolves could be hunted to earth. Some method should be devised for their summary punishment. The laws of free America should be so amended that these professional Anarchists and midnight plotters against life and property would be prevented from setting foot on the soil of this country. They are more dangerous than loathsome disease, and should be given no opportunity for transplanting their principles of destruction from the Old World to the New. Those men who were arrested in Chicago yesterday evening while they were counseling the death of the police and encouraging each other to deeds of the greatest violence are not ordinary criminals. Their offense cannot be measured by any statute now on the books of this country. Special laws should be made to fit the crimes of incomplete and unexecuted intentions of those red handed believers in governmental chaos.

MR REYNOLDS'S PROTEST.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER. Dear Sir: Known to be the friend of law and order, I hav no sympathy with bomb-throwing Chicago policemen or any other scoundrels, either in or out of office. The wretch who resorts to dynamite and indiscriminate slaughter to avenge private or public wrong should be securely confined within a lunatic asylum.

But freedom of speech, the right to assemble and to discuss the acts of any government official (servants of the people), from president to town constable, is guaranteed by our Constitution.

Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed; and whenever any form of government becomes destructiv of liberty it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it. So says the Declaration of Independence.

Of course the editor of the Press-Times has a right to publish the insane ravings of an absinthe or opium inflamed brain, but no lover of liberty, no good American citizen will help by advertisments or subscriptions a paper that will publish such atrocious desires as are expressed in the concluding sentence of the foregoing editorial, "Special laws should be made to fit the crimes of incomplete and unexecuted intentions of those red handed believers in governmental chaos"

The czar of Russia—any despot the world has ever known—never conceived greater atrocity. Think of it! Make a law to punish "incomplete and unexecuted intentions."

This would padlock all honest lips, silence every tongue that dare attempt to utter protest against usurpation, wrong, or tyranny, and make servil, abject slaves of the American people.

Such a declaration in the leading editorial of a paper published in the chief city of Washington, that justly boasts of having the most Liberal and liberty-securing constitution of any state in the Union, is an insult to her liberty-loving citizens.

Yours truly, C. B. REYNOLDS.

To Our Subscribers.

We are in sore need of the amounts due on subscriptions and ask everyone who owes us money to be especially prompt in sending it.

This also is the time of year when a great many subscriptions expire, and an immediate renewal will be a favor to us.

Owing probably to the elections and the labor incident to gathering and marketing the great harvests our friends hav neglected to forward what is due us, and we are consequently compelled to somewhat urgently remind them of their remissness. As Mr. Bennett used to say under these circumstances, Friends, let us hear from you.

To the Friends and Subscribers of Freethought.

I sincerely hope that all who hav supported Freethought in the past will aid the work to which it has been devoted by becoming subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER. THE TRUTH SEEKER will carry on the work, but it needs your coöperation. It is a means by which I can reach you and push on the Pacific coast labors. Especially I ask those in arrears to pay what is now due to THE TRUTH SEEKER and place their names upon its list as cordial supporters for the future. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Season to Work.

We giv this letter more than ordinary prominence because it sets forth facts which all should heed:

"BREATHEDSVILLE, MD., Nov. 24, 1891.

"MR. EDITOR: This season of the year offers an unusually favorable opportunity for Freethinkers to advance their cause.

"In rural districts especially, subscribers for Freethought books and periodicals are now more easily obtained than at any other season, because the longer evenings and suspended outdoor work leave people more time for reading.

"Expiring subscriptions to other publications also leave more opportunity to now supplant them with Freethought literature than at other times.

"Helping the youth to organize debating and literary societies to be held of evenings in neighboring public schoolhouses is very beneficial. Among other questions, theological ones can be discussed and ventilated. And when the young once form the habit of thinking for themselvs on other questions they will do it on religion also. This congregation also becomes a rival to the one at church, and, to the extent that it increases, lessens that at prayer-meeting and the sermon.

"Indefatigable effort judiciously directed will accomplish a world of good. And certainly we owe something to the cause for the Freethought privileges we enjoy.

"Yours truly, D. WEBSTER GROH."

Scatter papers and tracts, wherever you can, and always put in a good word for Freethought. An excellent method of opening the subject is to canvass among your acquaintances for signatures to the letters opposing Sunday closing of the World's Fair.

Books in Fine Bindings for Holiday Gifts.

We hav a large number of books suitable for holiday gifts, many of them in extraordinarily fine bindings, and we call the attention of our readers to them, hoping that when selection of presents is made the list will be consulted and purchases made therefrom. Among them are Paine's works, complete, in cloth, $3; leather, red edges, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50; the World's Sages, in same style of binding and at same prices as Paine's works; Ingersoll's Prose Poems, in cloth, $2.50; half morocco, $5; turkey morocco, $7 50; tree calf, $9. These are magnificent volumes. Also his principal lectures bound in one volume for $5. Either of Miss Wixon's books, The Story Hour, Apples of Gold, All in a Lifetime, is very suitable for a present, the first particularly for children. Voltaire's Romances, cloth, $1.50; half calf, $4, is a fine and uncommon work. D. M. Bennett's Around the World, in sets of four volumes, profusely illustrated, red cloth, $6.50, is a splendid present to a friend or to young men and women. It is full of practical to-day information about other countries and the noted things therein. The latest book which the Spiritualists are discussing is, Was Abraham Lincoln a Spiritualist? for $1.50. Helen Gardener's Men, Women, and Gods is a work of great value, $1, as is Winwood Reade's Martyrdom of Man, $1.75; Gibbon's History of Christianity, $2; Darwin's Origin of Species and Descent of Man, and others of his works. A catalog containing these and hundreds more—Freethought, scientific, medical, social, as well as standard—will be sent on receipt of a request for same.

Are There Any Such Things as Innate Ideas?

There is an experiment going on in a Boston institution which, if conducted scientifically, may result in enlarging the groundwork of metaphysics. A young female child, blind, deaf, and dumb since fifteen months of age, is being taught so much of the affairs of human beings as she can understand, but with a desire to find out how many ideas are innate, or inborn, she is watched with particular curiosity to see if she develops faculties not aroused by contact with others or by sensation.

One part of the experiment with the child is to ascertain whether the idea of a supreme being is innate. The child was smitten at an age when, her keepers believe, it was impossible for her to hav had any ideas beyond hunger and thirst. She has a mind of remarkable quickness and acuteness. All religious ideas hav been kept away from her. She has never had the word "God" or "Jesus" or "Sunday" or "religion" or "hymn" or any other word which would lead to inquiry upon religion. She knows the word "church," and she has been to church, and likes it, because of the sensation of people at rest which penetrates her, probably. But she does not know what a church is for, or why people go there. She simply has the word church. It is now proposed that this ignorance shall continue, says the writer of the girl's history. "No more about God, religion, or hereafter will ever appear in her reading or in any conversation with her. In a few years the world will begin to arrange itself to her and she will get many abstract ideas. She will begin to reason about things, to ask questions. Then it will come out whether a human being with no aid from other human beings, with no suggestions from the sound of thunder, the flash of lightning, with no view of trees and seas and mountains and skies, can yet rise to the thought of God. Most Theists hav held that such a human being could, because God has implanted a knowledge of himself in every human heart, a knowledge innate and intuitiv. If the child does some day ask after the great cause or address him under one of his attributes, it will be a striking argument for the theory of innate ideas. According to some Christian creeds this keeping of the child in ignorance of God and the tidings of heaven and hell would imperil the salvation of its soul. But perhaps Mr. Anagnos thinks there is enough difference of opinion on this point to justify his experiment."

The Sun, which prints the story, has endeavored to anticipate the result by obtaining the opinions of theologians and anti-theologians as to whether there will develop within her an instinct which will teach her that there is a supreme being who rules over nature; and if there does, or if there does not, whether the result of the experiment will prove anything; and whether her friends are doing right in keeping from her the opportunity to form any religious opinion by external influence.

The answer to these questions obtained by a Sun reporter varied with the theological beliefs of the persons interviewed, though the theologians were by no means as certain as theologians once were that innate ideas, especially the idea of a God, are a reality. The first man interviewed was the Rev. Mr. Parkhurst, a Presbyterian, who said:

"If this girl does not develop a religious instinct or giv some evidence that she possesses an innate conviction of the existence of a supreme being, it will not prove that there is no supreme being. It will, at the most, prove that the religious impulse is not inborn. A man, for instance, may hav an impulse, intellectual or artistic, and yet it may never assert itself without proper exterior incitement. You may be an artist, and yet your surroundings may be such that, although you hav artistic instincts and impulses, they may never develop. They are dependent upon outside excitation. I assert this without qualification. The direction of a man's life, the current of his thoughts, depend upon the influences which are brought to bear upon him. Take our ancestors who lived in the woods. They had the same impulses, possibilities, and instincts as you and I hav, yet they never exerted them because nothing was ever presented to them that tended to excite them.

"I think the outcome of this experiment will be to show that religious light depends upon some kind of exterior excitation, and my opinion is that this girl will never manifest any religious disposition unless something exterior is brought to bear upon her."

Mr. Parkhurst, it will be seen, has gotten away from the doctrin of innate ideas. Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, when asked for his views on the matter, expressed them very carefully and deliberately:

"I do not see," he said, "how a child born deaf and dumb and blind could obtain many ideas on any subject. If, however, it should turn out that such a child had any idea of any supreme being, this certainly would throw no light on the naturalness of such a conception, by persons who can talk and hear and see. Supposing it had a conception, all it possibly could establish would be that persons born deaf and dumb and blind might hav an idea of a supreme being. But whatever the conception of this person real or supposed, is or may be, I do not see that it sheds the slightest light on the question as to whether there is or is not what is called a first cause. I remember once a man was shot in the stomach, and when the wound was healing physicians made experiments to find out how long it took food to digest. I said to a physician at the time: 'How can I tell from the result of these experiments how long it takes my stomach to digest food? I could only guess at how long it might take if I had a hole in my stomach.'

"My opinion is that the questions of origin and destiny are beyond the human mind; that no mind is great enough to know whether there is or is not an infinit being. Consequently, there is no mind that can tell whether any fact tends to prove or disprove the existence of an infinit being. That is to say, if a man cannot comprehend a fact, he cannot tell whether any other fact tends to prove or disprove the fact that he cannot comprehend.

"The fact that a thing, an impulse, and instinct is natural does not prove anything. There was a time when almost all nations worshiped serpents and various wild beasts. There was a time when almost all people were cannibals. I presume naturally so. This proves nothing with regard to cannibalism being right or wrong. Cannibalism now is held to be wrong because many people object to being eaten, and they do not care how natural it is if they are afraid to or want to eat.

"The probability is that such a child as you describe would be more apt to be orthodox in its belief than one having the full complement of senses. It may be that a child that can neither hear nor talk nor see would be very ready to adopt the orthodox creed. To men of the lowest degree of education an impulse which leads them to trust in a superior being is most natural. They see and hear things and are afraid, and their ignorance leads them to try and get solid with the fellow who's making thunder and lightning. But as they advance and reach a higher plane of knowledge they begin to think, and want to hav things explained to them and then the instinct ceases."

When asked what he thought about the chances of salvation for the girl if she should die, he answered: "Oh, that's too silly for anything."

But Dr. Hastings, president of the Union Theological Seminary, still clings to the innateness of religious ideas, if of nothing else. He said:

"There is, beyond doubt, a kinship between the created soul and its creator, a union, a bond of divine sympathy, which will at some time and in some way assert itself. This relationship, the assertion of the kinship, may be manifested in any one or in many of a vast number of different ways, some of which we may comprehend, and some we may not, but the union exists under all circumstances, and in this way every human being has a knowledge of God. We Presbyterians all firmly believe this. We believe that every human being has a knowledge of God. The heathen hav such a knowledge of God, an innate knowledge of the true character of the supreme being, which is often shown by their reaching out and above their idolatry, and by this light they may achieve their salvation. This much is acknowledged and held by even the most rigidly orthodox among representativ Presbyterian clergymen. The child may not be able to express this knowledge in a way that we can comprehend, but that may be our ignorance and not the child's. It would be exceedingly hard to set up a standard by which to determin whether such knowledge existed or not. But such an experiment would not affect the child's future salvation. The child would be safe. You know my position on this subject of infant damnation. And indeed we all hold that idiots, insane people, and all such afflicted persons, are saved by God through Christ. If the child has no means of knowing God, and coming to him through the revelation of the scriptures, it will, of course, be saved. This is true of the heathen, who come to God through what light they possess."

Robert Collyer agreed substantially with Professor Hastings. "There never was a time," he said, "when a human being had no innate ideas. The germ of the idea of God is there; it exists in one form or another, and some day it will fiud expression. But how will these experimenters recognize the expression of the idea when it comes? It will depend altogether on their ideas of what the attributes of God are, and conceptions of this nature vary very widely different indeed. I cannot see that any good can come of such an experiment. Nothing of value that will be accepted generally can be brought out."

Dr. McChesney, Methodist, said: "The experiment can lead only to very doubtful conclusions. I believe every human being has innate ideas of God. Every human being at some time discerns between right and wrong, shows the possession of a moral sense, and is not this an attribute of the supreme being? How will they draw the line and determin what is an indication of intuitiv knowledge of God?"

Mr. Eugene M. Macdonald, the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, said to the reporter:

"No man can tell where the idea of a deity comes from. It would be the most natural thing in the world for this girl to wonder who made her, and who made the water which she drank and the air which she breathed, and the probability is that she would come to the conclusion that there is a big man somewhere who can do more than her father or her mother. She would reason within herself that a big man controls everything that she cannot see, and might even picture to her mind's eye how he looked, and then she would be just as well off as other folks.

"I keep my own boy without religion, and do not allow anyone to tell him about God or Sunday-school yarns. I think it is a good thing to keep children without that knowledge. Bad habits of thinking as well as living are too easily acquired. Not believing that the girl has a soul, I hav no opinion as to what will become of it."

A Catholic clergyman connected with Mgr. Farley's church said:

"The parents and friends of this girl are wrong. They are endangering her chances of salvation. What is the value of the experiment when compared with the child's soul?

"I do not doubt that she will hav some ideas—imperfect ones, of course—about a superior being, but they will prove absolutely nothing. The origin of ideas is from sensible things passing through a method of abstraction and becoming intellectual things. How, then, can a blind and deaf girl conceive definit ideas about anything?

"As to the girl's salvation, that would depend upon her sins. Although she may not hav conceived sins in so many thoughts, yet she may hav had thoughts which, even to her own instinctiv notions, are wrong. If she were to die without a sin on her soul except, of course, the original sin of our first parents, the case reduces itself to one like that of infants dying without baptism. It is certain she could not go to heaven. There is dispute, however, as to where she will go. Will she go to hell or is there a place specially for those who hav committed no sin of their own? Her parents are sinning, and the value of the experiment is not sufficient to make up for the greatness of the sin. 'What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?' These words are peculiarly applicable to this case.

"As to the experiment itself, I do not believe that God will create in her mind any other knowledge than that derived from sensible things by the method of abstraction to which I hav referred. That is the order of nature."

This "experiment" is more sensational than valuable, for it is by no means certain that the child will not be given hints in the direction desired by her teachers that her mind should take. The sense of touch alone will partially educate her. But the matter has served to bring out the fact that, with the exception of the Catholic clergyman, the doctrin of the damnation of all who know not God is an abandoned theory.

A Christmas or New Year's Present.

The "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book" in cloth binding ($2.50) is one of the best Christmas or New Year's presents a Liberal can make to a friend. Christmas is a pagan festival and New Year's is only a mark of time, but the Text-Book is a thing of beauty and a joy forever, and will help to rationalize the festival and make your friend forget the flight of years.

Mr. Peters's Idea of the Sunday Question.

The Rev. Madison Peters was asked to attend a sacred concert in Carnegie Hall the other Sunday night, with the offer of as many seats as he wanted for his friends. The invitation was a general one to ministers of note, as the management desired to remove the impression that concerts on Sunday evening are devices of the devil. But their missionary spirit could not prevail with such heathen as Dr. Peters. He waxed indignant, and made the invitation a text for a sermon. "I would like to know," he asked, "what these Sabbath desecrators and God-insulters take us for? I am not an advocate of a Puritan Sabbath, but I would rather hav a Puritan Sabbath than a Europeanized Sabbath. The music may be the finest, but it is the entering wedge to the secularization of our Sabbath, which will by and by make our holy day merely a holiday. The Sunday newspaper depletes our morning congregations, the open museums and the parks take the afternoon, and now the concerts propose to take the evening, and the world will hav the whole day. It seems to me that if the people hav six nights of the week for amusement that they should be willing to giv to God one night. If Andrew Carnegie means to use that magnificent building to run opposition to God and desecrate his Sabbath, then I say cursed be the day the hall was opened. This secularization of the Sabbath is a plain violation of the statutes of our state, and he who attempts to override the laws of the state insults every American citizen. It is time to call a halt. Are you cowardly enough to sit in sackcloth and ashes before the enemies of God, while they impudently strike at our most cherished institutions? In countries where the Sabbath is made a holiday, like France, Italy, and Bavaria, society is grossly immoral. In Sabbath-observing England, Scotland, and America society is found in its highest moral tone. History's lesson is that morality and Sabbath-keeping walk hand in hand in inseparable affinity. Society is degraded as Christianity is corrupted; and Christianity is vitiated as the Sabbath is perverted. The Sabbath question is a question of life and death in regard to Christianity. The enemies of religion could not destroy the gospel with the sword and the fagot. Argument, ridicule, and sophistry were all in vain. The last weapon the enemy seeks to employ to destroy Christianity is to corrupt the Sabbath and make it a day of festivity. Voltaire truly says: 'There is no hope of destroying Christianity so long as the Sabbath is kept as a sacred day.' I call upon all Christian citizens and patriots to stand irresistibly against this invasion of God's Sabbath. Will you not defend it as long as there is strength in your arm or blood in your heart?"

The Rev. Mr. Peters may not be discreet, but he is forceful, and though he states many things which are not so, he also tells the truth as to the church's position on this Sunday question. The day is of the utmost importance to the preachers; it is bread and butter to them, and it is no wonder they abuse those who would lessen their trade by attracting customers in other directions.

But, in his wrath, Mr. Peters has made some assertions which it is incumbent upon us, in the interest of truth, and that people may not be deceived by words spoken in angry haste, to correct. Firstly, Sunday is not the Sabbath, but the day of the sun. The Sabbath was a Jewish institution. The two should not be confounded. Secondly, God is not running the churches, and therefore Mr. Carnegie cannot be in opposition to him with his concerts. Thirdly, state statutes are nothing unless the people desire their enforcement. Fourthly, It is the Christians in Spain, Italy, France, and Bavaria who are immoral, as well as in England, Scotland, and America; and it is a fact that Scotland, the most pious of all, is the most immoral, producing more illegitimate children and consuming more whisky in proportion to population than any other country.

With these exceptions Mr. Peters's statements are about correct, especially that the Sabbath question is a question of the life or death of Christianity.

Send Stamp for printed Letters to Congressmen on the Sunday opening of the World's Fair. When you receive them, address them to your Congressman, sign your name, and send them to him at Washington, D. C. And if you can afford to, put in something for the Literature Fund, which enables us to print these letters.

Editorial Notes.

WE wish the Liberal lecturers would all follow Mr. Charlesworth's good example and get their audiences to vote against closing the World's Fair on Sundays, and hav such resolutions sent to the local directory of the Fair and to the state commissioners. Such action would offset the votes of churches on the other side.

OTTO ROTSCH, of Carthage, Mo., writes of a queer claim made by the Christians of his place, to wit, "That there is no such thing as a parable to be found outside of the Bible." Inasmuch as any allegorical relation or representation of something real in life or nature from which a moral is drawn for instruction is a parable, the Carthage Christians hav revealed their limited information rather than established a unique feature for the Bible. Every parent who tells the child in his lap a little story beginning, "There was once a man," and winding up with, "So you see little boys must be good," teaches in parables, and quite as usefully as did Jesus. Christna, Apollonius of Tyana, and other religious teachers, used parables quite as freely as the Christian exhorter of Judea.

IN concluding his articles on Italy and the pope in the North American Review, Ex-Prime-Minister Crispi says: "The pope does not consider himself free when he is not master, and he gives it to be believed that the state is oppressing him when it does not obey him. The Catholic priest is never satisfied with what is given him; every concession is always beneath what he desires, and his exactions grow in exact proportion to the benefits he obtains. . . . The confessional and the pulpit disturb the masses, trouble the consciences of the people, and breed disorder in moments of war." These are words the voters of this country should learn by heart. Let them profit by the experience of Italy, and never let the priests get control of our government. They are ruining the public schools, as it is, and ought never to hav the first concession made to them.

REV. MINOT J. SAVAGE recently lectured in Kansas City on "Immortality," holding that Spiritualism furnished the only proof we had of continued existence. This set the clergy of that city all agog, and Rev. J. E. Roberts, of All Souls' church, undertook the task, in next Sunday's sermon, of castigating Rev. Mr. Savage and repairing the damage he had done to the creed. But he only succeeded in making a bad matter worse. For instance, he declared "that neither immortality or the existence of God was susceptible of proof. That they were both assumptions. That the true Christian never entertains doubt, never asks a question, and never descends or condescends to evidence." We heartily commend the reverend gentleman for his frankness. An open confession is good for the soul. His admission that the Christian religion is built upon a foundation of assumption only is the first truthful utterance we hav heard from the pulpit in a coon's age.

HARRISON GRAY FISKE, editor of the Dramatic Mirror, says: "Colonel Ingersoll is a constant sufferer from the frauds of piratical publishers. Garbled and incomplete newspaper reports of the great orator's lectures hav flooded the market for years past, and Colonel Ingersoll has not only been robbed thereby of profits on the sales of his works, but he has had to father inaccurate and misleading reproductions of his most famous discourses. Mr. Clinton Farrell, who is Colonel Ingersoll's brother-in-law and publisher, tells me that efforts to restrain these rascally publishers are practically useless. Like the play-pirates, they are irresponsible, pecuniarily, while they are too numerous to follow up with prosecution in every case. A few years ago Mr. Farrell sued one of the thieves in Chicago. He got a judgment, it is true, but that was all he did get. The litigation cost thousands of dollars, and while it was progressing a dozen fresh offenders came to the fore. Mr. Farrell agrees with me that the only way to scotch literary and dramatic piracy is to make it a misdemeanor by legislativ enactment, with a penalty of fine and imprisonment for infraction of the law. In this connection I wish to say to Mirror readers that the only complete editions of Colonel Ingersoll's works are published by Mr. Farrell; that they hav been revised and extended by the author himself, and that they are almost entirely dissimilar to the cheap and fraudulent editions gotten out by the pirates." THE TRUTH SEEKER was a pirate once, but it long ago repented and now sells only the editions published by Mr. Farrell, with the exception of a few pamphlets which Colonel Ingersoll authorized us to publish.

Subscribers.

The holidays are almost here. Are you ready for them? A gift that would prove acceptable to any Liberal friend, and at the same time keep you in constant remembrance during the year, would be a year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Your own renewal and the new subscription will cost only $5.00.

Letters from Friends.

Calls It a Ritual for Nature's Worship.

GLADDENS, PA., Oct. 19, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER accidentally fell into my hands from a subscriber in Kansas, and ten minutes' perusal satisfied me. It was just what I had been wanting for twenty years to help me worship Nature's god in the backwoods. How small and insignificant to me is all the hollow mummery of the Christian's worship of the "Eternal Tyrant" in the clouds! May Heston's artful hand never grow weary nor your vigor abate in the cause.

Very truly yours, M. L. TAUBER.

More Such Willing Workers Would Get Us Our Rights.

FORT BRAGG, CAL., Oct. 23, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am receiving THE TRUTH SEEKER as changed from Freethought, and as I shall be quite lonesome without the paper you had better send it to me. Please send me some of the specimen sheets of the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book" mentioned in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I will try to distribute them. If I can induce any of my friends to purchase the book I shall certainly do so. Inclosed please find money for renewal and for one new subscriber. JAS. MARTIN.

Christians Mercilessly Cross Examined.

PORTVILLE, N. Y., Oct. 20, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I cannot go without the paper. I see some Bible questions in THE TRUTH SEEKER, so I would like to ask some of our so-called "Christian" enemies two or three. Where was Christ born? Matthew says, in a house (see Matt. ii, 11); Luke says, in a stable (see Luke ii, 16). Now, was he born twice, or did God inspire one of those gentlemen to tell a lie? If so, which? And did Judas Iscariot die twice? Matthew says he hanged himself (see Matt. xxvii, 5); Peter says he burst asunder and his bowels gushed out (see Acts i, 16). Will our devout friends tell us which is true? And if they do we will ask some more.

Yours for truth, JOHN R. COATS.

To Owe Is Christian, To Pay Is Liberal.

HURON, O., Oct. 20 E M. 291.

MR. EDITOR: To owe is human, to pay up is divine. So will remit $2 toward the G. O. P. (Grand Old Paper).

In regard to your editorial I will say, Well done, thou good and faithful servant; as thou hast been loyal to a few things, thou shalt be made proprietor over many.

I am trying to boom THE TRUTH SEEKER. I do not forget to drive a nail whenever I get a chance.

Tell Mr. Heston we don't want any of his monkeying, we want straight goods all the way through. An old friend of ours wishes to know what the monkey in THE TRUTH SEEKER is for. Tell him that it is his great-great-great-grandfather. Here is fifty cents for the Picture Fund.

My motto is, Do what is right myself and persuade others o do the same. For Universal Mental Liberty,

THOMAS GODDARD.

Literally "Sows the Seed by the Wayside."

FLAT CREEK, LA., Oct. 17, E M. 291.

MR. EDITOR: The faith guards (sentinels on the watch-tower of Zion) hav forestalled the minds of the people here against me and THE TRUTH SEEKER so that they will not receive from me and read that paper or any other Liberal literature. When I go to town or away from home with my team I carry some TRUTH SEEKERS and lay one by the side of each public road that I come to, pictures up, so that no two will fall into the same hands. This is sowing seed at random, but perhaps some of them will catch, germinate, and bear fruit. I am getting too old to make a living by following the plow. I hav no boys to help me and can get no labor here. I will hav to change my occupation. I would like to devote the balance of my life to the cause of Liberalism if I could obtain the means of subsistence by it. Perhaps I will take the lecture field.

Yours fraternally, P. F. SHUMAKER.

Detestable Oppression of Our Despots.

ST. ELMO, TENN., Nov. 4, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Atlanta, Ga., is holding an Exposition of the Advancement of the New South, said to be an excellent showing of the industrial progress of the section. Last Sunday there was a cheap railroad excursion from Chattanooga to Atlanta, $1 for the round trip. There were one thousand six hundred and fifty tickets sold. They were sold to laboring men for themselvs and families to go on Sunday—the only day they could go—to see the great Exposition. Arrived at Atlanta, behold the gates were closed. A madder lot of men, a more disappointed lot of women, it would be hard to scare up. Their curses were loud and deep. After all their effort they saw nothing, learned nothing, they had expected to see and learn. The pampered paupers, the preachers, did not gather in the coins they expected to. A positiv damage was done to the moral sense of a host of honest, industrious people, and the pulpit-pounding idiots got no harvest. If the Exposition had been open lessons of wisdom had been learned, no harm would hav resulted, and the praise of Atlanta would hav been on every tongue.

Let the Chicago show make a note of it.

Open Letter to a Humbug.

PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 12, 1891.

ANTHONY COMSTOCK, Sir: I notice as the time for the annual meeting of the society from which you draw your bread and butter draws near, that according to annual custom you hav selected your victims, and, as appears from your visit to our city last evening, are now preparing them for the sacrifice. For what? Is it, as you would hav people believe, from your superior love of virtue and morality, or is it not rather to show your zeal and activity to earn your salary as the activ head of the society which you represent? My object in writing is to suggest that by a little exercise of those peculiar smelling faculties which you possess it might be possible for you to ferret out in our bookstores, as well as upon most news-stands, many books which you in your learned wisdom hav decided to be hurtful to public morality. It is a fact that "Droll Stories," "Heptameron," "Decameron," Reynolds's works, Smollett, some of Paul de Kock's, and many other similar books are displayed in such a manner on our main streets that "he that runs may see." Should you fail to act on my suggestion, shall I attribute it to your Christlike humility and love of your fellow-man? JOHN A. WILSON.

A Kind of Bomb Thrower That We Approve.

OLIVE BRANCH, MISS., Sun's Day, Nov. 1, E M. 291.

MR. EDITOR: If I may run in for a short chat, I will not be very noisy, but may be a little impudent, for I want to make a suggestion—just a wee bit of an idea that I would see executed. Learning that the Bible pictures will soon come out in book form I want to ask that the volume contain a neat and convenient blank for family records. And my word for it, it will be duly appreciated by all good Liberals. Mr. Heston's artistic genius would come in well in this place, and I am sure we may look to him for an ingenious and fitting design. We skeptics would rather record the births and marriages of our families in this book than in the Holy Fish Tales. I hav a neat, new copy of the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book" in boards which I wish to exchange for any Liberal works worth the same amount ($2) and in good condition. I also want to get a letter from every good Southern Liberal who can inform me about the Southern lecture field. When I get a moment's time I hav something to tell you. I hav been throwing more bombs in the orthodox camp and am having heaps of fuss and fun with the sanctimonious and superstitious.

Our Burr has a good kernel about him. Does he not strike of late? "GRAY."

Some Deep Philosophy by a Spiritualist.

SAUQUOIT, N. Y., Nov. 10, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I often think of you, but never expect to see you in this life. But it is quite possible to meet you on a higher plane of life's unfoldment. Life lies back of all organism; it flows on beyond any conceivable history of organisms; it is an eternal function of the universe.

John Brown's body lies moldering in the grave,
But his soul goes marching on.

That song is the battle-cry of humanity, evolved out of a hundred centuries of selfishness. It is the voice of humanity triumphing not only over its dead self, but over death itself. It typifies more than this—that the soul of man is not only a product of evolution but is itself, above all things, obedient to and dependent on eternally marching on. We must never lose sight of the point that the real problem is whether man can go on with nature without limit; whether the evolution of life can be perpetually carried forward by and in him. For the moment he is perfect and there is no more advance to be made by him. There must be an evolution of a higher being or manifestation of life. This we know by the determined movement upward until man is reached. One form after another was flung aside, one creature after another, until the human creature. We must keep man on the track of evolution, or giv him up. Man is, as far as we can see, a finality in organism. Thenceforward evolution is the exaltation of ethical states. J. P. SMITH.

Liberal Love Feast at Auburn.

AUBURN, IA., Nov. 10, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: We hav just had an awakening in the shape of three lectures by J. E. Remsburg, the "Ingersoll of the South." Quite a goodly number of ladies were present, among them some of Auburn's best. The place is considerably shaken up, as it was something entirely new to most of hose present; so of course there is great divergence of opinion as to the subject-matter under discussion. The general expression is that the lectures were grand, scholarly, full of thought; and more, that it was an honest man that uttered his honest sentiments. By saying that there were several times each evening when one could hear a pin drop anywhere in the hall it demonstrates how intensely interested they were, and the hour seemed all too short. I do not doubt that many present did not know, could not hav told, what Infidels had done for the world until his splendid delivery of "False Claims" gave these facts gleaned from modern as well as ancient history. "Bible Morals," which exposes the crimes sanctioned by the Bible, is too well known to need especial mention here. "The Sunday Question" ought to rouse up every lover of liberty to do his duty whenever and wherever it is made apparent, especially in the coming warfare as to whether the World's Fair shall be open Sundays to the laboring classes in particular of the United States. This reminds me of Brother Sidney J. Rosenthal's letter of September 22d, in regard to having a Liberal hall before we invite the Liberals of foreign nations to the Fair of 1893, and I will say that E. M. Carr will giv $10 to so good a project. We hav G. N. Pratt's word that he will giv as much. J. L. Tompkins, of Lake City, has also signified his willingness to help in such an undertaking. Brother and sister Liberals, all that feel able, giv us an expression of your willingness.

Yours for truth and justice, MRS. E M. CARR.

A Pleasant, Forgiving Friend.

BUTLER, PA., Nov. 13, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: It is over a year since I called to see you in your office in New York one pleasant day, and I shall hav a pleasant memory of your little nucleus of truth as long as I liv. I hope you will continue to spread the sunlight of truth and dispel the darkness of the past. I hav just read the proceedings of the last Congress, and am sorry there was not more peace and uniformity in the meeting. But the meeting was really a free pitch-in. There was nothing too holy for investigation, and the result may be good after all. Keep the banner of liberty afloat; and the pictures should be posted at every cross-roads.

We hav a society here called the Twentieth Century Club. We hav a series of lectures, some Spiritual, some Liberal, and some Materialist, and we are living in hope of a brighter day. Our Spiritualists are among the best people in town, and how sorry I feel sometimes that these people are troubled with those visions of materialized spirits, and the trouble with me is to tell whether they are pretended or real. One thing good about them—they pretend to nothing supernatural, but attempt to account for everything by natural phenomena, or power imperfectly understood. But mind is growing everywhere, and here and there we see a shackle fall, and sooner or later all nature will be free. Many parents that belong to the church hav too much respect for truth to tell the Virgin ghost-story to their children, but the filthy work is done by the paid hirelings who make shrines for Diana for a livelihood. SIMEON NIXO.

A Tale of Torture—Compelled to Learn Scripture by Heart.

COVELO, CAL., Nov. 15, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: As long as I liv I hope to be a subscriber to the grandest paper I ever saw. I can hardly propose any improvement to the course you pursue, unless it be more pictures of Bible absurdities.

Reared as I was by a kind and pious mother, I was a strict attendant of church and Sunday-school in my young days. I was compelled to learn large portions of the New Testament by heart. Now, I suppose, because God failed to place the proper amount of credulity in my natural composition to believe all the unreasonable absurdities imaginable by an ignorant, superstitious mind, I am everlastingly lost and doomed to share the fate of my brother Infidels. But all the Christian threat of hell has no terror for me, and I glory in the name of Infidelity! Down with superstition and up with the flag of reason and liberty! Christians and preachers avoid me in discussion, and I am surprised to see so many finally admit that the holy word is not all inspired. When cornered they flop and squirm like a fish out of water.

I am sorry to see so many lukewarm Liberals in this little community, who dare come but halfway. They will listen to Christian argument, though they do not believe in a word. They are too cowardly to say so, and silence is taken for consent. One grand feature of your paper is "Letters from Friends." I am always glad to hear from my many friends, and hope to hear from them often through our grand old medium, THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I am happy to note the addition of S. P. Putnam to your staff, as I consider him the Ingersoll of the Pacific coast and a valuable addition to your force. When are we to hav Heston's Pictorial Bible?

Yours for universal liberty and truth, IRA C. HOXIE.

"Teach Religion in Our Public Schools."

ROCHESTER MINN., Nov. 16, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Why not make free ideas as "catching" as measles, mumps, or the very-old-Lord (varioloid)? It is true these elements are in the very atmosphere, and all-hail the day when we can in reality become just, free, loving, and progressiv. We hav had a long reign of Gods, Lords, demons, and devils; now please let's hav a good agitating thunder-shower of Freethought raindrops and wash away forever old fossilized teachings.

Rev. Mr. Mills, sent out by the American Sabbath Union from Washington, D. C., has visited this city. A few of his comments are as follows: "The three main opposing elements against our Sabbath Union work are the saloon men, the non-religious people, and the American Secular Union. It is the right of the government to protect her subjects in their right to attend divine services with their families on the Sabbath, and there are thousands of wage-workers on duty while their masters are at church. It is the duty of the church, as it is also of parents, to indoctrinate their children, and make them honorable members. Teach religion in our public schools, as the schools and the Sabbath will fall together. If our children are not taught to obey these teachings they will go to hell with the rest of the heretics. We now hav no national law upon the observance of the Sabbath. We do not intend to perpetuate the continental Sunday. We must act as a combined force and compel all work to cease on the holy Sabbath, and to that end are we working and we want you to raise $25 to help us." The amount was subscribed. The Presbyterian minister arose and said: "I protest against the opening of the World's Fair on the Sabbath; and if it is opened, I hope our Minnesota exhibit will be entirely covered up. Oh, the sin of it!" Now, this is food for those self-confident Liberals who are sure there can be no cause for alarm about getting God in the Constitution.

The Bible is read and prayers are delivered to God here in our schools. In some of the country schools the Catholic teachers hav the children learn the catechism. We evidently need another C. B. Reynolds to carry such cases to the courts and secure a purely secular education to all students.

Let no sects be taught in our public schools.
We need thinkers, not educated fools—
Men who will not be political tools,
And women who can do right without rules.

FLORA M. FOX.

Obituary—of the Gods.

SAVANNAH, GA., Nov. 9, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since it has been sold in this city, and I find it one of the best Liberal and reform papers published in the country.

If you hav space in your columns please publish a few remarks made in the interest of liberty and for love of mental, moral, and social freedom.

To those who hav given any thought to the study of the evolution of human knowledge, and applied to it their own reasoning powers, if they happened to hav any, instead of adhering to the self-constituted authority of the prevailing but outgrown religions of the day, nothing can be more plain than the fact that man has made his own gods; for, although all nature seems to speak to us of fixed laws and unknown powers governing the whole known universe, the moment we endeavor to fix their source and to invest these natural laws and powers with a personality and an individuality and to say to others in the loud and violent voice of dogmatism, "This he is and this he is not," then does this Great First Cause, or whatever else we may call it, begin to be circumscribed by all of our ideas concerning things which we really know nothing about.

And, furthermore, as all of the social creeds and customs of all countries are supposed to hav originated, if not by the authority, at least by the sanction, of this divine individual ruler and superintendent of the affairs of men, it has followed that the would-be monopolizers of the moral and intellectual forces of humanity, the church and state, hav always used the idea and image of their offended God as a bugaboo to frighten our race back into the condition of the ages of ignorance and faith, and to bind us to the Procrustean bed of belief in the sacredness of customs and conventionalities which our present and more complex civilization has long ago outgrown.

I giv in the following verses some further thoughts concerning the beforementioned attempts of man to make for himself gods in his own image, creating them male and female and breathing into their anthropopathically imagined minds and bodies humanity's own unhappy passions and prejudices; the tales of their loves and lives always conforming to all that is worst and best in the life of the time in which they are told; until, as our ideas and ideals become more refined, there is born in the world of mind what "Infidel Bob" calls "the noblest work of man, an honest God."

THE FATE OF THE GODS.

The dear, dead gods of the olden days;
Why hav they gone from the world away?
I would sing a song of worship and praise
To the gods conceived in our world's young day.

They were lovely and loving and tender and sweet
And dear to the heart of nature's child;
The footfalls of their fairy feet
Were heard in those old woodlands wild.

Their forms of beauty with glorious grace
Shone fair in all those ancient ways,
But now they are gone; not one of their race
Is left to be loved these modern days.

Strange new gods are in heaven to-day;
The world no longer remembers the old;
They hav all been cruelly driven away
And their lives as fanciful fables are told.

Beautiful and youthfully fair were they,
Those wonderful, worshipful gods of old,
But one by one, in a year or a day,
*For one dead gibbeted god they've been sold.

Humanity has coldly and cruelly killed them;
Their graves are hidden in the marsh of the mind;
They did all that their worshipers willed them,
Yet none that will worship them now can we find.

Strange are the ways of the children of earth;
They adore to-day and forget to-morrow;
The beings to whom their brains gave birth
In an after time they regard with horror.

But soon will all the gods be gone;
In the light of new truths they are vanishing fast;
We will need them no longer when science shall dawn
On a race whose childhood is over and past.

LEON LEMAIR.

*No disrespect is felt or expressed for the Nazarene reformer, who, if he ever existed, has no kinship with that ridiculously begotten god found only in the fairy tales of the Christian mythology.

On Hell, Satan, Christ, and Other Pleasant Things.

NEWARK, N. J., Nov. 10, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The Rev. C. A. A. Taylor, colored, has at last discovered the exact location of hell. The place is just fifty-two miles below the earth, at sea level, and has an area of 542,900,000 miles. I hope Old Nick has room enough to liv in to work and torture his unfortunate victims. The reverend gentleman does not inform us which road is the shortest route, but I suppose the theologians will hav a map printed before many days. There ought to be a short cut across lots. The reverend discoverer also tells us God-forsaken sinners that Christ went to hell and stayed there three whole days. Now, I think that Christ must hav been a good-natured sort of a fellow to hav kept company with his majesty and allowed Old Sooty to sit down on him, turn him over first on one side to toast him and brown him on the other. Now, my friend Mr. Hand said once in Liberal League Hall, when he answered a Christian philosopher, that when Jesus cast devils out of two-legged animals he just played and hugged them for fun and never offered to hurt them, and when they got the opportunity they ran down the throats of a farmer's hogs, who ran in the sea and were drowned. Now, if my friend Hand told the truth—and I believe he did, for he is a truthful man—that accounts for Jesus being so docil. If I had been Jesus there would hav been a Donnybrook fair in hell for a few seconds. I should break up such a bawdy-house. It ought to hav been raided long ago. If Our Bob ever gets there he will make short work of the infernal regions, for he is too chicken-hearted to see anybody suffer. Now, I propose to write to Chauncey Depew, who has possession of a part of the estate of my grandfather, Abraham Roll. He says he has had possession twenty-one years. Squatter sovereignty givs him the title. Might makes right all the world over. Now, if Chauncey will build a railroad to hell and giv me a few shares, I will sign off my share of the Mohawk property and giv him a clear title. Of course, he has not held possession of my property as long as the devil has held his acres, for the latter has owned them for over eighteen hundred years, and has never been dispossessed, or squatted on or disturbed by Gods, popes, cardinals, bishops, or priests, for they keep him engaged pretty much all of his time. He has no time to go to target excursions or picnics, like our worthy mayor of Newark, who is known as Picnic Joe. This mayor is a bona-fide God-fearing Christian gentleman, a sky-pilot, named Sullivan, declares. Joe has, with the help of God, held Newark city hall six years, and with the help of Kruger he intends to end his days in it, and I hav no doubt he will, for all Christians, when they get their paws or grapples on anything of value, never let go. Now, the Bible teaches the truth is not to be spoken at all times, but our Joe speaks the truth always. I happened to be in the same car with our worthy mayor once, and he was on his way to a picnic, and a Freethinker took the mayor for a Catholic priest and asked a gentleman where all the saints came from. He answered, "From East Newark." Joe said, "Mister, I can inform you." "You will oblige me, sir, if you tell me." Joe answered; "H. O. Pentecost can inform you, for a few years ago he stood very near his God, but lately he has wandered far, far away." And a gentleman said Kruger was his God and savior; and it was his Samaritan saloon-keepers that elected the mayor—every time a man was thirsty gave him drink; and if hungry there was a free lunch on the counter. I hav almost lost sight of my friend the devil. I never knew the reason Old Nick held the fort so long. It was because he was below sea level. If hell had been on top of the earth Jay Gould and other monopolists would hav confiscated the devil's domain long ago. God in his infinit wisdom knew that Christians were no respecters of people's rights or property. If Chauncey will build that road he will be well patronized, for he will carry nine passengers to hell to the Christian's one to heaven. There will not be any Tammany Catholics to take a journey to the vale of sorrows, for they are all booked for purgatory, where God's daughter-in-law presides, and after so many masses are paid for the priests persuade Mary to let up on her sufferers, and at her command they all take a hop, skip, and a jump to Saint Peter's door, and if they hav the sign, grip, and password, they are allowed to approach the God of good and evil, while the poor Protestant heretics remain in total depravity. I do not think that is a square deal. I will close by stating that our colored friend is just as certain he has discovered hell as a colored cook of a ship when he asked his captain to go ashore to see Mount Vesuvius. "Well, cuff, what did you think of the place?" The Christian answered, "Well, captain, when I seed all de coals of fire, cinders, and smoke coming out ob de flukes of dat hill, it looked like hell, it smelt like hell, and I hope I'll never be damned but I believe it is hell."

And finally I say, where there are criminals there are the devils, and their homes are hell. W. W. MORRIS.

Mistakes of Genesis.

BRADFORD, PA., Nov. 9, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav recently asked some of our good followers some questions in regard to the creation of the heavens and the earth—if they could giv me some information by some account of how something could be made out of nothing, taking nothing as the raw material. And I honestly cannot find one of them that can giv me an answer anyway satisfactory. Some tell me that it was produced out of a word. Some say it was in the will of the creator from all eternity. More said it was simply an omnipotent idea of God's from eternity, and about six thousand years ago he put it into practice. Then they tell me that anyone that cannot see it in that light must necessarily be a fool—forgetting at the same time they are running their chances of hell-fire for so saying. I simply ask the question, Who were the progenitors of Adam and Eve? I would like to know how it is possible for people to be generated without a cause. If we had an Adam and Eve we must of necessity hav had for them a father and a mother. There is no cause without an effect, and no effect without becoming a cause in its turn. Reasoning from this analogy, then, we cannot stop at the Bible Adam and Eve. We must seek the evidence somewhere else. And all this history of the human family is comprised within the short period of six thousand years. Starting with a certain amount of "slime" as the fundamental principle, according to the second account in Genesis, is in my opinion the profoundest kind of a failure. Why? Because the necessary elements are not contained in "slime." It is simply slime and it cannot rise above it. Of course these ideas satisfied the people in the times they were produced. But do they satisfy the heart and brain of the present? Decidedly not We are a few steps removed from barbarity, and theology cannot answer our questions. And if they are ever answered, and satisfactorily for all, believers and unbelievers alike, we will hav to expect it from some modern science. Mr. Darwin, I believe, has thrown some light on this subject in his "Descent of Man," and that doctrin is good enough for me, and for millions of others. He had no "slime" to start his theory on. In it there is nothing that terrifies. No heaven for believers, no hell for unbelievers. He only tried to prove that man and woman came from the same source, and in the opinion of every intelligent man that has ever read that work he has proved it conclusivly. He put no stress on it, asked no one to believe it, yet as far as I can understand he won only the abuse of the Christian world. And notwithstanding, take all the theological professors in all the colleges in the United States and they would not make one Darwin. And we would throw in Canada and Europe for ballast in addition, and the odds would still be in his favor.

Now, then, the question arises, Where did this being of infinit peculiarity come from? Back of the time he began to create there was undoubtedly an eternity, if we may be allowed the term, in which he did nothing, sat there in idleness and never took a thought, not even for "the morrow," and it seems all at once the idea occurred to it—or him, and I believe there is a question as to what it really is—to make a world. So at the beginning, before there was any time yet marked, he brought this universe with all its attending planets into existence. Is there a sane man anywhere in the world that can conceive of a time prior to time, as the starting-point? It looks something like a string with only one end. And we hav been guided along that string until we hav reached the way-station "Darwin," and a few paces farther down the string is the great union station "Ingersoll," and here we take the different branches to the realms of thought, and on all these little branches there is not a toll-gate. The scenery on all these different ways is on exhibition free. Take which way you will. You are your own judge. The motto is raised over the termini of all these different ways in large letters of bright gold, "Take whatever way you will, but giv to everybody the same privilege you ask for yourself."

Back of "Let there be light and there was light," we say there must hav been an eternity in which this God kept himself, a wilderness of vacuum which he could not tell any more about the extent of than I could. And if he produced all we can behold now with the aid of the telescope out of nothing we simply say that it is the grandest, the most profound move that was ever made. Did he do it? If so, when and how? Can some theological professor work it out? It is a question of very great importance, and the sooner it is answered the more convenient it will be for all inquiring minds.

I would say for the benefit of all who may read this article, that we hav found out all concerning this ancient account of creation in Genesis. We find now that the writers of it took advantage of the credulity of those far-away people and made them believe that all this information came about by inspiration. Let us see: "Asurboni-pal, king of Assyria in the seventh century before Christ, took great pains to build up the royal library of Nineveh. For this purpose his agents made thorough search in the yet-existing libraries of Chaldea for copies of those ancient 'books,' for so we may call them, of which the leaves were clay tablets. Such tablets were copied for Asurbonipal's library." It must be remembered that those tablets were only copies of older Babylonian tablets, and in some instances we find that even those are copied from old poems and oral accounts of the ancients, leading us back as far as 2000 B.C. In this library we find four different accounts of the creation. We find the very words copied in Genesis from them. Here, then, is where Moses got his inspiration. We must remember that Moses was raised by Pharaoh's daughter and instructed by the Egyptians, and these traditions would be easy for him to make out and understand.

In the times that Moses copied his books—if he ever did, and my candid opinion is that the church did it and then ascribed them to him, and gave them to the Jews—education was a scarce article, and but few people had command of it. Inspirations, miracles, and idiotic absurdities went hand in hand. Those that could read read them, and those that had ears listened while they were read. Nobody investigated. They were all followers, no leaders. Miracles were plenty, and easily performed. Credulity ran high. The man that could concoct the greatest crime and cause the most misery was considered after God's own heart. And they tell me that all those far-away home-wreckers, cut-throats, marauders, thugs, and evil-workers are now in heaven enjoying an eternity of peace. If so, why should an honest gentleman want to go there and take up with such associates? As for me I hav no desire to ever be an angel and keep the company of such a God. He is a fiend unworthy of a place in the mind of any intelligent man. Understand me, I do not mean to say there is such a being anywhere in existence. I simply say, if there is and he is the author of all our misery, he must necessarily possess all the attributes in the make-up of a fiend. Understand me, nor do I say there is not. I only giv my honest opinion on this matter, and say I know nothing whatever upon the subject. And after all, I think I know as much as any living man. And I say to every good man, do your own reading and thinking, and one benefit you will derive from it—originality. Your own opinions are as good as priests' and preachers'. Do not be afraid, but do your own thinking. Do it and you'll like it ten to one. JAS. SPELLEN.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Only an Empty Cradle.

Only an empty cradle
In a dark and lonely room;
Only a mother's plaintiv sob
Heard in the deepening gloom.
Only a baby's prattling voice
Forever hushed in sleep;
But the mother's heart is breaking
As she kneels by the cradle to weep.

The tiny form, now cold and still,
Is laid away at rest;
The lovely form was torn away
From a loving mother's breast.
How those baby lips were pressed to hers
In happy days gone by!
How the t'ny arms had clasped her neck
With a glad and loving cry.

She had slept the sweeter in the embrace
Of her baby's arms at night,
But now she must lie awake and weep,
Longing for morning's light;
And the warm kiss that thrilled her so
Will never be felt again,
'Tis this that causes her tears to flow
And her heart to throb with pain.

Ida Amelia Ballou.

A Child's Conclusions.

Heaven is filled with "glory,"
And gilded round with gold;
The corners nailed with diamonds,
And there 'tis never cold.
And so, if I were Jesus,
And owned that palace fair,
I'd make of it a poorhouse
And call the freezing there.
I'd run a pipe from hell up
And warm the "great white throne,"
And giv a place to the little folks
That havn't any home.

Heaven is filled with love, too;
From jasper walls to gold
It shines in all the faces
That stay there, so 'tis told.
And so, if I were Jesus,
I'd call the unloved there—
Those that hav no mothers
And cry for want of care.
And I would fill the earth
And every home with love;
'Twould be so kind to do so—
So like the "heaven above" (?).

And there's other things in heaven
That we want so much below;
There's justice in the pleasure-land,
And mercy too, I know.
And so, if I were Jesus—
Not just a little girl—
I would giv earth all the blessings
And to hell the curses hurl.
I would giv to life the pleasures—
Not keep all for "by and by"—
For what if I am doomed to hell
'Stead of heaven when I die?

Yet I cannot play the golden harp,
And I cannot sing a tune,
And I think it's awful lonely
Just to gaze around a room.
Then I've got a few bright pennies
That I'm sure I want to keep,
And I'd hav to hold 'em tightly
If I ever went to sleep,
For the thief that was with Jesus
When he went up through the air
Is sure to think that no one
Would think of stealing there,
And so I believe I'd rather
Go with papa down to hell;
It isn't half so hot there
As I've often heard them tell.

For I've found out all about it
And my papa says 'tis true,
That the ones that go to sheol
Will be a "chosen few."
But I am very curious
For a little maid of ten,
And want to know particulars
Of how and where and when.
I may be all mistaken—
The preachers think I am—
For I know, if I were Jesus,
I'd work heaven on a better plan.

Concentration.

The power to concentrate the mind upon one subject and keep it so fixed that outside influences will hav no effect is a great quality.

Very few possess it. The concentrativ forces can be trained, however. Practice does much in that line. I was fully impressed with this the other day while visiting a room in a certain high school.

The teacher bade the large class of sixty scholars prepare an example in addition of figures—ten rows of figures, five figures in a row. "Now," said he, "go to work and find the sum of these figures. Miss Wixon, we will make all the noise and disturbance we can, but scholars, you keep right on with your work and pay no heed."

The teacher commenced whistling, while I walked about the room talking and laughing. "Can you play the piano, Miss Wixon?" inquired the teacher. "A little," was my reply. "Come and play a tune, then," said he, opening the instrument near the desk. "I'd rather hear you play," I said, when he commenced banging away at the instrument. I struck the bell several times, and chatted away merrily. The pupils worked away at the figures with bowed heads, for the most part as solemn as judges. The teacher called several names of the boys sharply. "Can't you answer when spoken to?" he inquired. "What's the matter, anyway?" I tumbled the books around, and asked questions, and we kept up a general disturbance till the time of the exercise was up. Seven of the class had finished the example, and others had nearly finished theirs. It was quite amusing, but a very useful lesson.

To be able to keep the mind fixed upon a given subject in a room where there is much talking and questions being asked, piano played and doors slamming, besides other annoyances, is a great accomplishment. But it can easily be done by training and practice. The teacher that day said he intended to bring in some torpedoes some day, and he expected his class to pay no more attention to those explosions than if they were asleep.

Concentration. It is a great thing. This is necessary in counting-rooms, in editors' sanctums, shops, etc, wherever business is done and people liable to drop in at every moment.

To keep the mind calm and fixed on the work in hand, undisturbed and undismayed, shows ability and firmness. S. H. W.

Prehistoric Man in America.

In various parts of this country prehistoric remains are constantly being brought to light. In the fertil valley of the Mississippi, along the shores of the Great Lakes and the Gulf of Mexico, in the canyons of the Colorado, on the plains of Texas and Mexico, in the valleys and mountains of prehistoric Montezuma (Arizona), on the crests of the Rockies, in the gravel beds of New Jersey, Delaware, Ohio, Indiana, and Minnesota, beneath the lava beds of the Pacific coast, and in many other places, interesting archeological discoveries are being announced. In fact, evidences of a prehistoric race are found everywhere; but probably the most interesting fields for investigation on the American continent are in southern Colorado, New Mexico, Arizona, Mexico, Central and South America, where the ruins of many millions of people are found buried by the dust and drift of ages. These people had their rude arts in which they were well advanced, such as weaving, mosaic, tempering copper, working in stone, making pottery, painting, etc. They were also well advanced in building, as their solid stone walls and structures will testify, and they carried on agriculture to a great extent. They expressed thoughts and inscribed records by means of hieroglyphics. Their religion was a peculiar one; they worshiped the sun, and hence they were called fire or sun worshipers. They laid their dead to rest in their buildings, always placing their ornaments, arms, and personal property with them. It cannot be ascertained how the race was exterminated. Some conjecture that it was by disease, or famin; others, that it was by continued cold winters, or prevailing hot winds, and some few that it was merely by speedy violence. A great many theories are given in regard to these people, but none of these theories can be readily accepted. We hav only the evidence of a prehistoric existence, and it will take time to decipher the true facts, and there is probably much about these queer people that will never be learned. The antiquarian has a hope that time will bring to light many records that will help to lift the mysterious veil. These records, engraved upon stone or copper, are undoubtedly hid somewhere beneath the soil, and it will take time, patience, and labor to locate them. This we know, that these people were called Aztecs. The skeletons found show that they were larger than the people of to-day. They were not savages or barbarians as some may suppose, but they were a progressiv, intelligent race of people.

I am indebted to Mr. A. L. Heister for the interesting facts recorded in this article. Mr. Heister is an indefatigable and enthusiastic antiquarian and archeologist living in Magdalena, N. M. He has been working in the old ruins of that region for several months, and he is finding relics of all kinds, such as trinkets and ornaments of stone and shell; beads of beautiful blue turquois, cut in artistic shapes and finely polished, also other curious beads, pottery pitchers, vases, canteens, bowls, jugs, basins, cups, etc., that cannot be described. Mr. Heister says that some are carved in relief or in a sort of indenture work, others are finished in black or red enamel, and still others are striped, checked, and zigzaged with beautiful colors which hav defied the touch of time and are as bright to-day as they were from one thousand to five thousand years ago when the artist plied his brush. Many other beautiful relics too numerous to mention are being found by Mr. Heister and other antiquarians. In my next I shall describe some of the old ruins, and from time to time acquaint the readers of the Corner with old ruins and relics found in various parts of the country. Archeology is an interesting study and it is becoming more important all the time. George J. Remsburg.

An Easy Lesson.

There were two very young women—aged five or thereabouts—and exactly of a size. One had long yellow curls tumbling about her round pink face and big, wide blue eyes that looked fearlessly at everything. The other was fair, too, but her eyes were dark and timid and there were little nervous whirls in her silky black locks. The pair were trotting along the wide pave of an uptown residence street at about 6 o'clock in the afternoon. After three blocks of it Miss Blue Eyes said, in just her mamma's tone:

"Now, Bessie, dear, I must kiss you goodbye. Your home is just around the corner and nothing will hurt you. There is a policeman right opposit; run home now, and be sure you come again soon. I hav so enjoyed our talk about the dear little doggie and the dolls. Tell Julia my Estelle sends love to her, and come to-morrow. I am so glad always"—floating off in the middle of a sentence.

Bessie went around the corner all a-tremble, and probably got safe home. Half way across the block her companion heaved a deep, world-weary sigh and said reflectivly, "You just hav to be polite—but my—ain't it awful tiresome sometimes?"—New York Recorder.

Comfort.

There is a great deal in words. Some words giv us a glow of kindly feeling. Others fill us with love and sympathy, and others with patriotism, and still others with disgust and loathing.

This morning as I sit here in the delightful sunshine of the Indian summer days I feel so cosy and comfortable I want you to enjoy the word comfort with me.

It brings up such a long train of enjoyable ideas.

To comfort is to cheer, solace, enliven, invigorate, and console.

To feel comfortable in body is to be warm, well fed, and perfectly at ease.

To be comfortable in mind is to hav a sense of satisfaction and ease. The comfort of friends, of love, and of home.

To be free from worry and care. It is a state of quiet, pleasant enjoyment.

I would that all could be comfortable, comforted and comforting.

Affectionately, Aunt Elmina.

Almost Remembered.

Ernest's grandfather is a doctor, and had been for some time treating a patient for St. Vitus's dance.

Ernest had seen the sufferer from the strange nervous disease, and felt much sympathy for him.

The other day he hurried from his grandfather's office to his mother's room to say, "O, mamma, mamma, here's another poor little boy who has the—the—I can almost think of the name—the St. Patrick's jump!"—Youth's Companion.

What Struck Him.

Two eminent scholars were discussing educational questions in a very profound way not long since.

"What was it," said one to the other, "that struck you most forcibly in the course of your education?"

"The schoolmaster," said the other.—Youth's Companion.

Correspondence.

Des Moines, Ia., Nov. 16, 1891.

Dear Miss Wixon: This is my first letter to the Corner.

We take The Truth Seeker, and I enjoy reading the children's letters, so I thought I would like to write for the Corner, too.

There are a good many Liberals living near us.

Most of my Sunday afternoons I spend at Sunday-school; and I often question my teacher as to the proof of some of her Bible sayings.

One Sunday I asked her if she hated father, mother, sister, and brother, as is said in other words in Luke xiv, 26, and it fairly astonished her.

She claimed that it did not mean what I thought, but that it meant to hate them for not believing as a Christian.

At another time I told her that I thought if God had power over everything, that he ought to either kill or convert the devil; but she did not know about that.

Neither did she know several other questions which were asked not only by myself but by some of the other pupils, who are at times liberal in their views.

I would like to hav some girl write to me. Well, I guess my letter is long enough for the first. I will try and write more next time. Hoping to see this in print,

I remain your sincere friend,
Laura B. Huffman.

[A bright, intelligent girl is the writer of the above letter, and we shall always be pleased to hear from her.—Ed. C. C.]

The Bible and Evolution.
By Arthur B. Moss.
New and Cheap Edition, - - 50 Cents.
Mentioned by W. E. Gladstone in his work, "The Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture."
G. W Foote in the Freethinker recommends it as an excellent text-book. He says: "The manner is good and the style is bright. The reader is carried along on an easy flowing stream of science, history, ethics, and common sense."
Chas. Watts in Secular Thought pronounces it to be the best work the author has written.
And The Truth Seeker says: "This is an excellent book which we can recommend to our readers as clear in language, trustworthy in statement, and irrefutable in reasoning."

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

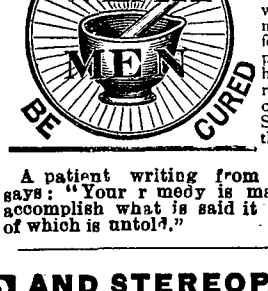
DONALD KENNEDY

Of Roxbury, Mass., Says:



Strange cases cured by my MEDICAL DISCOVERY come to me every day. Here is one of Paralysis—Blindness—and the Grip. Now how does my MEDICAL DISCOVERY cure all these? I don't know, unless it takes hold of the Hidden Poison that makes all Humor.

VIRGINIA CITY, NEVADA, Sept. 9th, 1891.

Donald Kennedy—Dear Sir: I will state my case to you: About nine years ago I was paralyzed in my left side, and the best doctors gave me no relief for two years, and I was advised to try your DISCOVERY, which did its duty, and in a few months I was restored to health. About four years ago I became blind in my left eye by a spotted cataract. Last March I was taken with La Grippe, and was confined to my bed for three months. At the end of that time, as in the start, then it struck me that your DISCOVERY was the thing for me; so I got a bottle, and before it was half gone I was able to go to my work in the mines. Now in regard to my eyes, as I lost my left eye, and about six months ago my right eye became affected with black spots over the sight as did the left eye—perhaps some twenty of them—but since I have been using your DISCOVERY they all left my right eye but one; and, thank God, the bright light of heaven is once more making its appearance in my left eye. I am wonderfully astonished at it, and thank God and your MEDICAL DISCOVERY.

Yours truly, HANK WHITE.

News of the Week.

AT Sholavandan, south India, to propitiate a goddess and remove small-pox, cattle plague, and famin a man was swung by hooks through the flesh of his back from a pole erected in a cart. The cart was drawn in procession, and the supporting muscles were nearly torn through.

FONSECA, the would-be dictator of Brazil, resigned in favor of the vice-president.

NEW YORK Jews will form a club for legal defense of members of their race against assaults of hoodlums.

ENGLISH country doctors are complaining that parsons swell their salaries by practicing medicin, though unlicensed.

SUPERINTENDENT MACDONALD of New York's insane asylums refutes by statistics the notion that insanity is increasing.

IN Persia the high priest of the Shia'h sect, the chief religious body of the land, fomented a revolt, but it was subdued.

THE strongest opponents of Canadian annexation are the aristocrats who hold titles which would be lost were their country annexed.

GLADSTONE says that the Liberals when they regain office will empower local bodies to take land to distribute in small allotments among landless laborers.

SOME Jews are urging their co-religionists to erect in New York or Washington a monument inscribed, "O America! without righteousness no nation can liv!"

THE pious French-Canadians are, complains Abbe Dugas, being ruined by love of pleasure and dress, intemperance, idleness, demoralization from the political system, and distaste or agriculture.

A JESUIT spy was discovered in the character of servant in the household of the marquis of Salisbury, premier of England, where he had been placed to learn secrets concerning the Vatican.

JEWISH leaders say that "the general introduction of Sunday services to the Jewish temples of America is bound to come," and that "any attempt to force the Jewish people to attend services on Saturday will be futil."

CONVERSION of Princess Sophie of Prussia, now wife of the crown-prince of Greece, to the Greek church, has introduced an element of discord between Germany and Greece, and strengthened Russia's influence in the latter.

THE Pennsylvania storm of the 23d ult. demonstrated the disfavor in which churches are held by providence by blowing down a remarkable number of those buildings. At Hecla children who had sheltered in one were killed.

MRS. SARAH BROWN was arrested for talking wildly on religion in New York streets. She said: "I won't do it again, unless I hav a summons from on high. Then what can I do? I must speak." She had become deranged by mission work.

To the suggestion of some Catholics that Italy be made a federal republic with the pope as head of one of the states, Catholic leaders reply that "it would not solve the papal question even if the pope were made perpetual president, and this is not talked of. As governor of a state in the federation, the pope would be in the same position theoretically which he now occupies. He would be a citizen of Italy, not an independent sovereign."

AT the county hospital at San Francisco Mrs. White, in the surgical ward with a broken leg, converted several of the ward's occupants to belief in faith cure. The speedy knitting of her broken bone, she said, was due not to the processes of the skilled surgeons, but to her believing prayers. She had her converts promis that at a certain hour they would leave bed, kneel in prayer, throw aside crutches and tear off such splints as any might hav, and walk home. At the hour attendants rushing in at cries of pain found Mrs. White and another lady writhing on the floor and others with their splints about torn off ready to make the attempt. No one was seriously injured but Mrs. White, whose leg was rebroken and wrist sprained.

Gems of Thought.

MEN are imaginary invalids, whose weakness empirics are interested to encourage, in order to hav sale for their drugs. They listen rather to the physician who prescribes a variety of remedies, than to him who recommends good regimen and leaves nature to herself.—D'Holbach.

JOB BELIEVETH NEITHER IN GHOSTS NOR RESURRECTION.

As the cloud is consumed and vanisheth away; so he that goeth down to the grave shall come up no more. He shall return no more to his house, neither shall his place know him any more.—Job vii, 9, 10.

THE immense majority either never examin the opinions they hav inherited, or examin them so completely under the dominating influence of the prejudice of education, that whatever may hav been the doctrins they hav been taught, they conclude that they are so unquestionably true that nothing but a judicial blindness can cause their rejection.—Lecky.

For hundreds of years the church fought with all its power the science of medicin. Priests used to cure diseases by selling little pieces of paper covered with cabalistic marks. They filled their treasuries by the sale of holy water. They healed the sick by relics—the teeth and ribs of saints, the finger-nails of departed worthies, and the hair of glorified virgins. Infidelity said: "Send for the doctor." Theology said: "Stick to the priest." Infidelity—that is to say, science—said: "Vaccinate him." The priest said, "Pray; I will sell you a charm." The doctor was regarded as a man who was endeavoring to take from God his means of punishment.—Ingersoll.

SPAIN shows the characteristics of a country where theological considerations hav been all-controling for centuries. Down to the interference of Napoleon with that kingdom, all sanitary efforts were looked upon as absurd if not impious. The most sober accounts of travelers in the Spanish peninsula until a recent period are sometimes irresistibly comic in their pictures of peoples insisting on maintaining arrangements more filthy than any which would be permitted in an American backwoods camp, while taking enormous pains to stop the pestilence by bell-ringings, processions, and new dresses bestowed upon the local madonna; yet here, too, a healthful skepticism has begun to work for good; the outbreaks of cholera in recent years hav done some little to bring in better sanitary measures. — Prof. A. D. White.

IF mind can be followed down to the first instinctiv motions of the earliest forms of matter, and is proved to depend on the organism, may it not yet be shown that the first motion that signifies intelligence is as truly a development from the inherent nature of matter as is the growth of the structure? The assumption that there is an eternal distinction between mind and matter, and that it was necessary at some point for a God to step in and conjure the principle of mind into matter, would thus be shown to be false by the proof of the theory that matter has always possessed the principle of determining the actions of matter which we call mind. —Robert C. Adams.

As far as Jehovah is concerned, Mary, it would seem, can be of advantage to him in only one way. There are, or were, so many bottles of her milk among the convents of Christendom that, undoubtedly, she must be mighty in the lactation line. She very likely supplies Jehovah with milk, and saves him the expense of keeping an Alderney cow. But we may place as a set-off to this the report of a recent tourist in Italy, who asserts that 150 convents hav each the head-dress of the Virgin. What a sum she must hav run up for bonnets! To suppose that a man in the position of Joseph the Carpenter paid for these bonnets is sheer nonsense. No doubt, when he discovered the extravagant character of "the Virgin," he inserted an advertisement in the Jerusalem Gazette and Bethlehem Courier:

I, JOSEPH, CARPENTER AND WHEELWRIGHT, of Jezebel St., Nazareth, do hereby giv notice that after the 18th of this month Nisan, I will not hold myself responsible for debts contracted by my wife Mary, usually nicknamed "The Virgin."

No doubt Jehovah had to put his hand deep into his breeches pocket and pay for these bonnets. Pestered with his poor relations, and especially by this horrible Mary, all things considered, Jehovah has written remarkably well. I am free to admit it to be a wonderful thing, under the circumstances, that the Bible is such a sensible book as it is. —Saladin in God and His Book.

A NEW CANDIDATE FOR BAPTISM—WHY CANNOT SATAN BECOME A SAINT?

Notes and Clippings.

THE Catholic Review says that apart from political and commercial interests, religious hatred always holds a more important place in South American questions than Catholics imagin.

WITH the desire of giving her husband a true picture of herself, a woman in Atchison, Kan., had her photograph taken as she appeared at daily housework in her kitchen dress, with a baby on one arm and broom and dustpan on the other.

REMENYI, the violinist, was unable to keep his engagement at Seidl's concert Sunday evening because Sunday trains, with one or two exceptions, are prohibited in Connecticut. It may be doubted, says the Herald, whether any state has a right to interfere with the running of through trains across its borders. The train service from Massachusetts to New York through Connecticut is interstate commerce, and the courts hav repeatedly held that such commerce is beyond the control of a state. Only Congress has the constitutional right to regulate it.

DR. LENZ says that when he went to Fez, one of the capitals of Morocco, he found a most unlooked-for custom among the women. Mohammedans are not supposed to drink spirituous liquors, but Dr. Lenz says the women in Morocco are universally addicted to the practice. The Jews make a brandy for which their customers are almost exclusivly Moorish women. While the men are strict prohibitionists, the women drink brandy in large quantities. Women who came to Dr. Lenz's house to see his Moorish servants never failed to ask him for a glass of wine or cognac, and he was surprised to see the quantities they could drink.

ARE the country people wickeder than the city people? The Sun truly hopes that they are not, but the proceedings of the Episcopal congress held in Washington last week, it says, show that one of the eminent divines who was a delegate to that body believes that they are. When the subject of "mission work" was before the congress, the Rev. Dr. Nicholls, of New Haven, made a speech urging the church to maintain its missions in the rural regions, and, according to the report, he "characterized the wickedness of the country as vastly worse than the wickedness of the city. He even went so far as to express his fear of the bad influence that the country exerts upon the city. This is not the ordinary view of the case, or the romantic, poetic, idyllic, bucolic view, and we must await the evidence in support of it which the Rev. Dr. Nicholls, of New Haven, Conn., is doubtless prepared to present.

I ASKED a scholarly New Yorker, says a Sun writer, who recently traveled through Turkey in Europe under favorable circumstances, whether he had seen in the Mohammedan world any signs of the "higher criticism" of the Koran, or any challenging of the authority of Mohammed, or any evidence of the influence of science and of modern thought upon the popular religion there. He replied that he had not. He thought that the new speculation of the age had not affected the Moslem mind in any way; that all such things as I had asked about were as far beyond the range of Islamism in our times as they had been in past centuries, and that orthodoxy and fanaticism still reign supreme in Turkey and in all its mosques. It is to be said, however, that the opinion of this scholarly traveler is not sustained by all other observers of things Turkish. One of these others alleges that there is a school of rationalists among the Turkish Mohammedans, though few outsiders become aware of its existence. The disciples of the higher criticism of the Koran find it advisable to refrain from bombilation.

THE antagonism between state and church in Brazil is becoming acute. The government charges the clergy with having engaged in machinations for the restoration of the empire, and the clergy accuse the government of being hostil to the interests of the church. The clergy hav never liked the republic, and hav remained, with few exceptions, attached to the imperial house. Their feelings of hostility to the republic hav been intensified by irregularity in the payment of salaries. When the official connection between the church and state was declared abolished, the federal government engaged to provide for the payment of all salaries to the existing functionaries of the hierarchy and to support the chairs in the seminaries for one year, leaving it to the provinces to do as much more as they pleased in the interest of religion. Most of the provinces hav chosen to do nothing, and where priests hav died altars remain vacant for want of a salaried ministry. The Brazilians, unaccustomed to voluntary contribution for clerical support, are learning to neglect religion, and the church sees the people slipping away from it. These circumstances hav created a bitter feeling and tended to intensify the attachment of the clergy for the Catholic house of Braganza, which never neglected them. The government, on the other hand, which had paid little attention to the signs of clerical discontent, now recognizes the clergy as politically hostil and possibly dangerous, and steps will doubtless be taken on the reassembling of congress toward abolishing any remaining responsibility of the federal government for the support of the church establishment.

BESIDES the reason given a week or two ago why the admission of women to political functions is regarded by Mr. Spencer with profound misgiving, he has in view another feminin trait which has arisen by adjustment to the conjugal relation, to the necessity of making a wise choice of husbands under the social conditions that hav long prevailed. Power, bodily or mental, or both, is and ever has been the masculin characteristic by which women are most attracted. Hence in women an instinctiv worship of power under all its forms; and hence a relativ conservatism. Authority, no matter how embodied, politically, ecclesiastically, or socially, sways women far more than it sways men. It follows that the sentiment of reverence, which power and the trappings of power excite, must, if votes were given to women, strengthen all authorities, political and ecclesiastical. Coöperating with their preference for generosity over justice, this power-worship in women, if allowed fuller expression, would increase the ability of public agencies to override individual rights in the pursuit of what might be thought beneficent ends.

Colonel Ingersoll On Liberty.

Last week the Chicago Press Club held the first of its winter series of entertainments in the Auditorium. Colonel Ingersoll had been invited to deliver an oration, and there were present nearly five thousand of the most intelligent people of Chicago. The following appeared in the Chicago Sunday Tribune: Colonel Ingersoll came on the platform a few minutes after 8 o'clock, and as his rosy face beamed on the audience the thousands responded with a generous burst of decorous applause. The lecturer was introduced by Henry D. Lloyd, and spoke as follows:

FREEDOM DEFINED.

Ladies and Gentlemen, what do I mean by liberty? Let me explain myself. If a man is prevented from going where he desires by a range of mountains, or by a swiftly flowing river, or by wild beasts, he does not feel that he has been enslaved. If he comes to the bank of a river which he wishes to cross, and there are tigers on the opposit shore, he does not feel that he has been robbed of his freedom. But if there is a man like himself on the other side with a gun, who says he shall not cross, he feels that his freedom has been interfered with. In other words, the idea of liberty, the greatest and grandest that can enter the mind of man, is not to be interfered with by like intelligences, whether on earth or in heaven; not to be interfered with by those who can gloat over the victory. And in the world of thought, in the world of speculation, there should be nothing but absolute liberty. [Applause.] In the world of action my liberty stops where the liberty of another commences, but in the world of thought there are no possible limitations. [Applause.] There is room in the intellectual air for every wing, there is room out on the intellectual sea for every sail, and in the great republic of mind, one is a majority; every brain, every soul is a sovereign, robed and crowned absolutely free. And in that republic of mind all good citizens giv to every other human being every mental right they claim for themselvs. [Applause.] And in that republic whoever appeals to force is a traitor. So, to-night, for the most part, I wish to speak of the liberty of thought, the right to investigate, the right to guess for yourself, the right to people the future according to your own fancy, and to paint such pictures upon the canvas of the beyond as you want [applause], dictated to by none others. And if there be gods, I giv to them the same right that I claim for myself. [Applause.] I liv in a republican government, and I want to liv in a republican universe [applause], and if there is to be an arbitrary being who is to control the thoughts and loves and passions of men by brute force, let us elect him. [Laughter and applause.]

BELIEFS OF OLDEN TIMES.

In the good old days—and not so very many days ago—our forefathers (and I hav no doubt they were honest) absolutely believed that it was necessary for all human beings to think alike, especially on those questions about which nobody knew anything for certain. [Laughter and applause.] Our good forefathers really believed that there was somewhere in the infinit expanse a being whose happiness could be interfered with by some poor man crawling upon this obscure earth. They believed it; and they believed that this being had promised eternal joy to all who should think in a certain way; and had threatened eternal misery to all who had a mind of their own. [Laughter.] Now, so believing, our ancestors—they are all dead, and that is the best thing I can say about them—[laughter]—our ancestors, acting logically from the belief, logically from the premises, said we will make everybody believe the same—and they thought they could do it. And yet all the mechanics of this world, all the ingenuity that has ever been born in the subtle brain of man, cannot make two clocks that can keep time alike one minute. [Laughter.] It is impossible. All the ingenuity of the world, aided with all the machinery that has leaped from the brain of man, cannot make two things alike, and no one man can do it, and nature cannot do it. [Applause.] In all the forests that clothe the world there are no two leaves exactly alike. And now, when autumn has come upon us, and that wonderful officer called Death has painted every leaf of all the trees, no two hav been painted alike. And yet our old forefathers absolutely thought they could make thousands and billions of human beings—each clad in a robe of living, throbbing, passionate flesh, each driven by the storms of passion over life's sea—think exactly alike. Utterly impossible! And if you could, what a stupid world this would be. [Laughter and applause.]

INTELLECTUAL SPLENDORS BORN OF FREEDOM.

I believe in the intellectual splendors born of freedom and diversity instead of the stupidity and orthodoxy of force as applied to the brain of man. Yet our forefathers believed it and they acted on the belief. When I used to read the old stories about burning people and torturing them do you know I could not realize it? It never seemed to me that it was really so, and it never took hold of me until I saw the instruments, the arguments that our forefathers used. I saw, for instance, two little pieces of iron attached together by screws, and when some man—well, when he said he didn't believe a fish ever swallowed a sailor to keep him from drowning, then they put these two pieces of iron on his thumb, and the gentlemen who loved their enemies began screwing these two pieces of iron together. [Laughter and applause.] They said to this man: "You hav made a mistake in your logic; you hav dropped a link; we do this to call your attention to the subject." [Laughter and applause.] So they kept on until finally the poor wretch, suffering the agonies of the fabled damned, said: "I hav made a mistake" [laughter]; and I do not blame him. I think I should hav done the same. I would hav said: "Write it down, and I will sign it; hav one god or a billion, but stop that." [Long-continued laughter and applause.] And do you know to-night I wish there never had been a martyr in this world? [Laughter.] A race that has to be raised from barbarism to civilization by the agony of martyrs had better remain in the mud where it started. And yet there was now and then a fellow who was such a brave soul he would not recant; and then these gentlemen who were all forgivness screwed this down to the last thread. And had it not been for such men all of us would hav been barbarians to-night; all of us naked, with pictures of wild beasts tattooed on our flesh, dancing around a dried snake—had it not been for that splendid spirit which said: "I will be true to myself; I will never stain the whiteness of my soul"—and, understand me, I am sorry they did it.

OTHER "ARGUMENTS" OF OUR FOREFATHERS.

And so I saw another of the arguments of our forefathers, "the collar of torture." Imagin a circle of iron, and on the inside of that more than a hundred points sharp as needles. This being fastened upon the throat the sufferer could not sit down, could not stand or walk; he could not stir without being punctured by these needles, and in a little while the throat would begin to swell, and in a little while suffocation would end the sufferings of that man. That argument was called the "Scavenger's daughter," and when some man said, "I do not understand your arithmetic; how can three times one be one, and once one be three? there is something wrong in your theological multiplication table," they put him to this torture and kept him in that position until insanity and death in pity came to his relief. And this is done by the gentlemen who said: "If smitten on the one cheek, turn the other." This was done for the purpose of spreading the gospel of "eternal love." Now, there is a mistake somewhere. There is such a difference between the argument used and the object to be attained that somebody has blundered.

And so I saw the rack with windlass and chains upon which the sufferer was laid; about his ankles were fastened chains, and about his wrists also, and then priests began turning this windlass, and they kept turning it until the ankles, the shoulders, and the wrists were all dislocated, and the sufferer was wet with the sweat of agony. And they had a physician standing by to feel his pulse. What for? To save his life? Yes. What for? What for? In mercy? No; simply that they might preserve his life that they might hav the pleasure of racking him once again. And that was done in the name of universal love, forgivness, and benevolence. Not done to one or two, but to hundreds of thousands. And when I saw this, I began to realize what had been done by superstition.

WHERE MEN HAD BEEN BURNT.

I also saw two places where men had been burnt. What for? Michael Servetus had a difference with John Calvin. Michael Servetus said: "Son of the eternal God." That was his description of Jesus Christ. Calvin said: "No, the eternal son of God; not son of the eternal God, but eternal son of God." And for that difference Michael Servetus was burnt at a slow fire of green wood. And when the wind blew the flames somewhat away from his body so that his sufferings were lengthened, he cried out to put the wood upon the other side, that he might die, and they looked and laughed, and would not answer his petition. But in the midst of flame and smoke, true to his conviction, he said: "Christ, son of the eternal God, hav mercy upon me." His prayer was not answered. But I say when I saw these things, then I realized it. When I looked at these arguments it seemed to me as though I had suffered all these things, as though I had stood upon the shore of exile and looked with tear-filled eye toward home and nativ land, as though I had been taken from my wife and children, taken to the public square with fagots piled about me, as though flames had played around me and scorched my eyes to blindness, as though my ashes had been scattered to the four winds by the hand of hatred, by the hand of cruel priests, as though I had stood upon the scaffold and had seen the glittering ax fall upon me. When I thus felt I swore that while I lived I would do what little I could not only to preserve but to augment the liberty of man, woman, and child. [Long-continued applause.]

But, after all, it is a question of intellectual development. Tell me the religion of a man, and I know the point he has reached; I know what he is intellectually; I know what his brain is worth. Tell me what he believes, and I know what he is as a man. So it is a question of intellectual development.

RESULT OF INTELLECTUAL DEVELOPMENT.

A little while ago I saw the models of nearly everything man has made for his use and for his convenience. I saw all the models of all the water craft, from the dugout in which floated a naked savage—one of our ancestors [laughter]—a naked savage with teeth two inches long, with a spoonful of brains in the back of his head; I say I saw the water craft of the world from the dugout up to a man-of-war that carries a hundred guns and miles of canvas: from that dugout to the steamship that turns its brave prow from the port of New York through three thousand miles of billows, with a compass like a conscience, that does not miss a throb or beat of its mighty iron heart from one shore to the other, and saw at the same time weapons that man has made, from a rude club such as was grasped by that savage when he crawled from his den and hunted a snake for his dinner, from that club to the boomerang. And I saw at the same time the musical instruments, from the tom-tom to the instruments of our day, that make the air blossom with melody. I saw these things, and I said to myself, after all, it is a question of intellectual development. And I saw from the rude daub of yellow mud up to the art that has enriched the galleries of the world with its paintings and sculpture, from the rude god with five or six heads and many ears and several rows of eyes, to the statue chiseled by genius with such beauty and such a personality that it seemed almost impudent to speak to it without an introduction. [Laughter.] I saw these things. I saw books; books written on leaves, on the shoulder-blades of sheep, on the skins of wild beasts, up to the illustrated volumes of our day, that enrich the libraries of the world—and I do not say the word library that I do not think of the saying of Plato: "The house that has a library in it has a soul." I saw these things and I said to myself: After all, this question of religion it simply a question of intellectual development. A man with a great brain will not hav a mean, selfish religion. [Laughter and applause.] Well, now, how is it we hav improved on the dugout? How is it we hav improved on the musical instruments? How is it we hav improved in the arms of war, defensiv and offensiv? It is because the whole world has said we want better boats, and to whoever invents them we will giv wealth and honor.

NO PROGRESS IN RELIGIOUS BELIEFS.

The whole world has said, We want better books—in certain directions. The whole world has said, We want better music. And so from the rude beginning, we hav the instruments of our day. The world has held out all the rewards in its power. But when it came to religion, then they said no. That fellow in the dugout had a religion; he was orthodox in his day; he believed in a devil,—the same devil we believe in. [Laughter.] And let me say here there has not been an improvement made on the Christian devil for thousands of years. [Laughter and applause.] He has a long tail, arms of fire, and a cloven foot, such as many ministers suppose I am possessed of. [Laughter and applause.] That fellow in the dugout said: "My religion is good enough," and others said the same. Now suppose we had pursued the same course in every other department of knowledge that we hav in religion, what would hav been the result? Let us be honest. Suppose the kings and priests had said—and I presume there was a priest, because it was a very ignorant age of the world [laughter]—that the dugout is the best ship that can ever be built, that the model was given to a pious sailor by Neptune, the god of all the seas, and any man that talks of putting a stick in the middle of it and some cloth on it is a heretic. [Laughter and applause.] He is a blasphemous wretch, and he should die the death. What effect, in your judgment, would that hav had on the circumnavigation of the globe? If the king or priest had said, "The tom-tom makes the finest music of which the imagination can conceive; that is the kind of music they hav in heaven, and an angel sitting on the edge of a wet and fleecy cloud playing upon that tom-tom became so entranced, so enraptured with her own music that she let it drop, and that is how we got it [laughter and applause], and any man that says he can improve it by putting a back and front on it, and several strings, and talks about a bow and resin, let him die the death." Do you believe if that course had been pursued that human ears ever would hav been enriched with symphonies of Beethoven, and with the operas of Wagner [applause]—the great music that carries the soul captiv on wings of fire?

RIGHTS HE WOULD CLAIM.

But the world has said: "Giv us better music; not better religion, but better music." And so all through every development the world has said: "We want better." Now, I want to improve on the religion of that gentleman in the dugout. All I want is the same right to improve on his ideas of heaven and God, of law and of science, that the rest of the world has to improve upon the dugout or upon the tom-tom. [Laughter and applause.] But suppose that the king and priest had said: "That crooked stick is the best plow that can ever be made; that was given in answer to prayer; and that twisted straw is the ne plus ultra of twisted things, and any man who denies it we will twist him." [Laughter.] Do you believe that the fields of the great Northwest and of this our great and splendid country would hav been covered with wheat and corn? Now, all I ask, all I plead for, is the same right to improve upon his theology as upon his agricultural implements. That is all. And yet some people go so far as to think that I am almost an Infidel [laughter and applause], because I am really in favor of a sensible, reasonable religion, one that a man can put his heart and his brain into. I want a God, if I hav one, who is a gentleman, because I hav been taught that truth and justice and virtue and generosity are the same in every star.

THE RIGHT OF THINKING FOR ONE'S SELF.

Now, imagin for one moment the impudence of a human being claiming the right to think for himself who will not giv it to other people. If I hav not the right, who has? Can I get the right by uniting with a few other people in building a little church and putting a steeple on it and a bell in it? If each individual has not the right, then I say combined they hav not the right. If each human being on the earth has not the right to think, then the whole world has not the right to thought. [Applause.] All I claim is that each man be honest with himself. There was a gentleman, a nice man, a minister, who asked me if did not believe the Bible, and I told him frankly I did not; and he said to me: "If you do not believe it you ought not to say it." "Pretty good," I said. "Do you believe it?" He said he did. I said: "I do not know whether you do or not; maybe you are following the advice you gave me." [Laughter and applause.] And do you know I shall die without knowing whether that minister believes the Bible or not.

Now, I say to them, "Suppose I go to Turkey and they giv me the Koran and say, "Read it," and I read it carefully, and they ask me, "Do you believe it?" Now, if I did not believe it what ought I to say—no matter whether I wanted office in Turkey or not? [Laughter.] What ought I to say and preserve my manhood? Why, of course you say, "Say that you don't believe it." Well, off in the United States I read your book, and when I get through and don't believe it, what ought I to say? Well, they say: "It will be better for you if you keep still." Now, that is all I claim—liberty for every human being. When you destroy liberty of mind, it has the same effect upon the progress of the world that it would hav upon the progress of the Mississippi if you destroy all the little streams that feed it. If you could destroy all the springs that feed the great ocean it would become sand; so it is with the information of the world; it comes from individual brains; they are the springs and fountains. It is the duty of every man to tell what he knows, that he may add to the sum of human knowledge, to which all contribute and from which all may draw. [Applause.]

HONEST UNBELIEF VS. HYPOCRISY.

If there is in heaven an infinit being he never will be satisfied with the worship of cowards and hypocrits. [Applause.] Honest unbelief will be a perfume in heaven when hypocrisy, no matter however religious it may be outwardly, will be a stench. That is all there is to it; giv every other human being all the chance you claim for yourself; to keep your mind open to the voices of nature, to new ideas, to new thoughts, and to improve upon your doctrin whenever you can. That is my doctrin.

But we are advancing, and we are beginning to hold all kinds of slavery in utter contempt; do you know that? And we are beginning to question wealth and power; we are questioning all creeds and all dogmas; and we are not bowing down to a man as we used to do, simply because he is in the robe of a clergyman; and we are not bowing down to a man now simply because he is a king. No! We are not bowing down simply because he is rich.

When I think of how much this world has suffered I am amazed. When I think of how long our fathers were slaves I am amazed. Why, just think of it! This world has only been fit for a gentleman to liv in for about twenty-eight years. [Laughter.] It was not until the year 1808 that Great Britain abolished the slave trade. Up to that time her judges sitting upon the bench in the name of justice, her priests occupying the pulpit in the name of universal love, owned stock in slave-ships and luxuriated in the profits of piracy and murder. It was not until the year 1808 that the United States abolished the slave trade between this and other countries, but preserved it as between the states. It was not until August 28, 1833, that Great Britain abolished human slavery in her colonies; and it was not until January 1, 1862, that Abraham Lincoln wiped from our flag the stigma of disgrace. [Great applause.] Abraham Lincoln—in my judgment the grandest man ever president of the United States [continued applause], and upon whose monument these words could truthfully be written: "Here lies the only man in the history of the world who, having been clothed with almost absolute power, never abused it except on the side of mercy." [Loud and prolonged applause.] Think, I say, how long we clung to the institution of human slavery; how long lashes upon the naked back were the legal tender for labor performed.

THE LIBERTY OF BODY.

And let me tell you to-night what I mean by the liberty of body. It is to giv to every man what he earns with his hands. [Applause.] And this great question of division has got to be settled even in the United States. [Applause.] Capital takes too much; labor gets too little. [Applause.] Labor will not always liv in a hut with capital dwelling in a palace. [Applause.] Flesh and blood are more sacred than gold, and the time will come when the law will see that every man has the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit not only of happiness, but the right to catch some of it before he dies. [Laughter and applause.] I want to liv until there is such a thing as the aristocracy of labor. [Applause.] I want to liv until I find an aristocracy of honesty, of generosity; an aristocracy of intelligence; an aristocracy of heart and brain. I am sick of the old kind. [Applause.] I want liberty for every man. I do not believe in the law of supply and demand as applied to flesh and blood. [Applause.] If they who toil cannot hav some of the good things of this world, then I do not want anybody to hav them. [Applause.]

But if men hav been slaves, what about women—the slaves of slaves? Let me say right here to-night, I regard marriage as the holiest institution among men. Without the fireside there is no human advancement; without the family there is no life worth living. Every good government is made up of good families. The unit of government is the family; anything that tends to destroy the family is perfectly devilish and infamous. I believe in marriage, and I hold in utter contempt the opinions of long-haired men and short-haired women who denounce the institution of marriage. [Great applause and laughter.] Let me say right here—and I hav thought a good deal about it—let me say right here the grandest ambition that any man can possibly hav is to liv and so improve himself in heart and brain as to be worthy of the love of some splendid woman [applause]; and the grandest ambition of any girl is to be worthy of the love and adoration of some magnificent man. [Applause.] That is my idea, and there is no success in life without it. If you are the grand emperor of the world, you had better be the grand emperor of one loving and tender heart, and she the grand empress of yours. The man who has really won the heart of one good woman in this world—I do not care if he dies in the ditch a beggar—his life has been a success. [Applause.] I say it took millions of years to come from the condition of abject slavery up to the condition of marriage. Ladies, the ornaments you wear upon your persons to night are but the souvenirs of your mothers' bondage. The chains round your necks and the bracelets clasped upon your wrists by the thrilling hand of love hav been changed by the wand of civilization from iron to shining, glittering gold; but nearly every religion has accounted for the devilment in the world by the crime of woman. What a gallant thing that is! And if it is true I had rather liv with the woman I love in a world full of trouble than to liv in heaven with nobody but men. [Laughter and applause.]

WOMAN THE EQUAL OF MAN.

Now, my friends, it seems to me that the woman is the equal of the man. She has all the rights I hav and one more, and that is the right to be protected. That's my doctrin. You are married; try to make the woman you love happy; try to make the man you love happy. Whoever marries simply for himself will make a mistake; but whoever loves a woman so well that he says, "I will make her happy," makes no mistake. And so with the woman who says, "I will make him happy." There is only one way to be happy and that is to make somebody else so, and you can't be happy cross-lots; you hav got to go the regular turnpike road. [Laughter.]

If there is any man I detest it is the man who thinks he is the head of the family—the man who thinks he is the "boss!" [Laughter.] That fellow in the dugout used that word "boss" [laughter]; that was one of his favorit expressions; that he was "boss." [Laughter.] Imagin a young man and a young woman courting, walking out in the moonlight and the nightingale singing a song of pain and love, as though the thorn touched her heart—imagin them stopping there in the moonlight and starlight and song and saying: "Now here, let's settle who's 'boss!'" [Laughter]. I tell you it is an infamous word and an infamous feeling. A man who is "boss," who is going to govern in his family, and when he speaks let all the rest of them be stil, some mighty idea is about to be launched from his mouth—do you know I dislike this man unspeakably; and a cross man I hate above all things. What right has he to murder the sunshine of the day? What right has he to assassinate the joy of life? When you go home you ought to feel the light there is in the house; if it is in the night it will burst out of the doors and windows and illuminate the darkness. It is just as well to go home a ray of sunshine as an old, sour, cross curmudgeon, who thinks he is the head of the family. Wise men think their mighty brains hav been in a turmoil; they hav been thinking about who will be alderman from the fifth ward; they hav been thinking about politics; great and mighty questions hav been engaging their minds; they hav bought calico at eight cents or six, and want to sell it at seven. Think of the intellectual strain that must hav been upon a man, and when he gets home everybody else in the house must look out for his comfort. A woman who has only taken care of five or six children, and one or two of them may be sick, has been nursing them and singing to them, and taking care of them, and trying to make one yard of cloth do the work of two—she, of course, is fresh and fine and ready to wait upon this great gentleman—the head of the family. [Laughter.] I don't like him a bit.

Do you know another thing? I despise a stingy man. I don't see how it is possible for a man to die worth $50,000,000 or $10,000,000 in a city full of want, when he meets almost every day the withered hand of beggary and the white lips of famin.

LITTLE CHILDREN AS SLAVES.

Now, if women hav been slaves, what shall we say of little children? The children are just one shade worse than the women. Most people hav an idea about bringing up children, instead of letting them grow. [Laughter.] You furnish a climate in the house, and the children will grow beautiful; but you must furnish the climate. In your house must be the climate of kindness, of honesty, of justice, and of generosity, and just as long as the climate exists those children will grow free and fair and beautiful. I hav pity for the children—the children of the poor and of the rich, the children of the gutter and of the palace. I hav sympathy with them all, because they hav no liberty. If you want your children to tell the truth you must stop lying to them. [Laughter and applause.] Over in Michigan I heard a story about a little boy at Grand Rapids. His father and mother had often promised to take him out riding, but they always evaded him. One day he caught them just as they were driving away, and he said to the nurse who had brought him to the door: "There goes the two worst liars in Grand Rapids." [Laughter and applause.] I do not believe that children can be made honest through fear. There is no reforming power in fear. You can scare a man so badly that he won't do a certain thing, but I will take my oath you can't frighten him to that degree that he won't want to do it. [Laughter and applause.] And as long as he wants to do it there is no reformation. There is no reforming power in brutality. Children will grow only in the climate of kindness, in the climate of goodness. Giv them a chance to be honest. If your child tells a lie, tell him you hav told lots of them, and you hav found out it is a bad policy. [Laughter.] Don't pretend to be a saint, because after a while your child will see through your robes. [Laughter.] Let us be perfectly free and frank with each other. Tell your boy, "You hav never done anything worse than I hav done, and probably never will." [Applause.] When your child commits a wrong take it in your arms, let it feel your heart beat against its heart, and let the child know that you really, truly, and sincerely love it.

DIFFERENT VIEWS OF SUNDAY.

In the old times Sunday was too good a day for a child to be happy in. [Laughter.] That is what this gentleman in the dugout thought. [Laughter.] He said, "You ought on Sunday to giv your entire mind to the goodness of God in so arranging matters that nearly everybody is to be eternally damned. [Laughter.] You ought to go and hear a sermon of that kind preached and call it recreation. If you work all the week in the dust and the heat, and wish to be built up so that you shall be strong enough for another week, go and thank God that you are still out of hell." [Laughter and applause.] In those old days they believed in the doctrin: "Be miserable, Sunday. Don't walk out. Stay at home. Go to church if you go anywhere. Be sad. Wear the longest possible face. If there is a beautiful picture, don't look at it. If there is any music, don't hear it. If there are any flowers, don't be tainted with their perfume. Think of hell. [Laughter.] Think about corpses [laughter], and shrouds, and epitaphs, and worms [laughter], and graves, and the worm that never dies. [Laughter.] Improve your minds. And if there happens to be a fair in your neighborhood, especially if it is a World's Fair, don't go near it on Sunday." [Tremendous and long-continued applause.] They would say: "What shall it profit a man to look upon the landscapes of a great artist, those beautiful, tender, pathetic things? What shall it profit a man to see the

News and Notes.

Orange, among the orange groves, is somewhat in the shadow of orthodoxy, but the sunshine of Liberalism is there also, and an appreciativ audience greeted me Saturday evening, November 21st, and it looks as if the work for the future in this place would be on the front line. There are stanch Liberals here. On my arrival I was invited to the genial home of Mr. and Mrs. Chas. Baker. Mr. Baker is a newspaper man of wide experience in this Western country, but he does not find that the ordinary journal givs sufficient scope for genuin reform. Like many of our friends in this section he is interested in the Nationalist movement and the People's party. He sees, however, that Freethought is necessary to political advance, that reform is not a matter of sentiment but of science. Mr. and Mrs. Joel Parker, Mrs. Handy, Mr. J. H. Parker, are also among our allies here, and with such to stand by the colors I am sure that Orange will be a pleasant camping-ground for the soldier of Freethought. The fires will not go out.

I arrive in San Diego Sunday noon; Sunday evening a large audience greets me at the Opera House. The subject is "Freethought and Morality," and I could not find a better reception for radical ideas.

On Monday evening I hav the pleasure of meeting several friends of various schools of thought at the residence of Mrs. Calhoun and Mr. and Mrs. Surplee. Mrs. Calhoun and her daughter, Mrs. Surplee, were formerly residents of New York city, where I met them in literary and social circles. It was pleasant, after so many years of change and travel, to meet them again. Mrs. Calhoun is well known in the journalistic world, being a contributor to many of the leading papers in the way of correspondence and descriptions of travel in America and the old countries. On this Monday evening I was favored with the company of Rev. Mr. McDaniels and wife. Mr. McDaniels is the Unitarian minister of San Diego. He is of the broad church. He has very little of the theological biss. He looks at things from the humanitarian standpoint. He is doing an excellent work here, and his church is for generous and progressiv principles.

Mr. and Mrs. A. E. Horton were also present. They represented the Spiritualist element in this congregation which makes no discord. Mr. Horton is called the "Father of San Diego." He once owned nearly all the land upon which the city now stands, and has nobly aided in building up and advancing the interests of this community. His Liberalism extends even to the orthodox churches, and he has helped them to erect "temples of worship." He gave the Methodist church a lot valued at $100,000, and the ministers of that denomination devoutly thanked God for the gift, but they never thought of thanking Mr. Horton. It would never do for the church to be grateful to an Infidel. Mr. Horton is not afraid of the word "Infidel," and is always true to his convictions, and expresses them. He can be generous to Christians, but the Christians do not seem able to appreciate the spirit of his act.

Mr. and Mrs. Sidney Thomas and Mrs. Wilson of the Theosophical Society represent this beautiful and transcendental philosophy, and if I were to consult simply my feeling in the matter I might revel in this romantic creed. Judge Thomas is president of the Theosophical Society of San Diego, and is an able and brilliant exponent of its doctrins. He mingles more common sense with his ideas than I think is generally the case. He presents his side of the universe in a very attractiv manner, and would reach his conclusions through science and not in spite of it. There are subtle questions in Theosophy, and just where reason ends and imagination begins it is difficult to determin. Where is the supreme genius who has yet defined the exact limits of human knowledge? This was a delightful evening of social and intellectual entertainment, and I must thank my old New York friends for this happy reunion on the shores of the Pacific.

Tuesday morning I leave this elegant city, and take my way toward the wild mountains of California. It is delicious weather. Sea and sky mingle in exquisit luster. The hills are brilliant along the vast horizon. The iron horse carries me as far as Lakeside, twenty-one miles from the city. I pass through the valley of El Lajon, one of the loveliest places on the coast, notable for its production of raisins, as well as other fruits.

At Lakeside I take the stage for Descanso, twenty-three miles away, but it is a six hours' drive, for most of the road is uphill. Twelv miles distant is Alpine, a pretty place, the scenery around which might remind one of the mountainous bosom of Switzerland. The Emerys are here, and keep the store and the post-office—Liberals from away back. From Alpine up the mountains we go on to the "Valley of the Old Women," or "the Old Ones." This is the English of it. The Spanish is more musical, but I hav not got the spell of it yet. It is said that the Indians used to bring their aged here to die—a very convenient custom. It saves the expense of burial and tombstones. In a civilized country it costs a man about five hundred dollars to die decently. This is ruinous, and it seems as if the time was coming when only the rich man can hav the luxury of death and burial. The poor man must liv on somehow. He cannot afford to take his last breath. The Indians selected a very delightful spot for "the old ones," and no doubt they went to their eternal sleep in a happy frame of mind, with summer winds about them, and lofty and glorious mountains pointing to the dazzling sky.

Beyond this valley we mount upward on a vast winding grade nearly five thousand feet above the level of the sea. It is here that one of the most magnificent prospects in the world stretches before the eye. It is a scene of marvelous splendor. Below is the valley with sparkles of water here and there in its green bosom. This valley unfolds into other shining valleys among glittering mountains—hight on hight—until the luminous and mighty landscape is lost in the effulgence of the sea, which, like a vast diamond, shines with blinding glory against the horizon. Point Loma advances its glowing front into the flood of light. The Coronado islands dimly tower; the hotel along the far-off beach appears like a fairy palace; the gigantic peaks, clothed with gold, a hundred miles in view, surround with massiv and tremendous shapes the soft and brilliant beauty that lies at their feet. It is worth a whole day's journey to look upon this gloriously colored and immense panorama.

From the hight of these mountains we plunge rapidly to Descanso—"place of rest" is what it means in Spanish. I suppose here is where the old-time pilgrims used to halt and find a night's rest beneath the folding hills.

Descanso is not a very large place. It would not even be called a village in this Western country. It consists of a store, a house, a barn, the stage-coach twice a day, and John Coombs postmaster. John Coombs is a character fitted to this wild and unique territory. He doesn't hav much religion about him, but plenty of human nature. He greets you in bluff fashion, but heartily, givs you a night's lodging if you want it and a good square meal. He has a big family, of all sizes. I don't know how many he has, and Coombs himself does not know until he counts. I enjoyed myself at this ranche over night. There were three other travelers besides myself, and I had as lively a time as if I had been in a metropolitan hotel.

This was Tuesday night. On Wednesday morning the air was so delightful, the prospect so alluring, that I struck out afoot for Buckman's Springs, eleven miles away—my point of destination. There is no stage-line to this place. Coombs rather thought Buckman would be in to Descanso, and it was my hope to meet him on the road. Five miles on my journey I reach Pine valley. This was the bed of an ancient lake. The pines skirt it all round, and the prospect as you come into the valley is a lovely one. Herbert Emery has a ranche here, the only habitation but one between Descanso and Buckman's. I made a fortunate guess, for just as I entered the valley I met Buckman. We knew each other, of course, for Buckman is a Liberal of the old time, a pioneer in this country. We shook hands. Buckman was on foot leading his horse. He offered me the use of the animal, while he took my method of locomotion to Descanso. I was glad of the exchange, and went onward. Beyond Pine valley I came into the wild canyon, where one might imagin himself a thousand miles from civilization, so desolate and solitary is the outlook. If I got off the trail I might wander over into the deserts of Arizona. However, I am fortunate again. I do not meet this time a "solitary horseman," but two ladies, Miss Winnie Buckman, and Miss Meda Grigsby, of the house of Buckman—daughter and granddaughter—and soon I am at the famous springs, famous in Southern California, and many visit them, although it is an out-of-the-way place. Buckman discovered these springs about fifteen years ago. This will be a popular resort some day when the country is developed. The canyon opens into a broad valley, and beyond are the vast mountains. From the hights about there are magnificent views. The ocean can be seen on one side and the great desert on the other. One cannot spend a vacation in a more delightful spot. There is always company. I found a clergyman here, Rev. Mr. Childs, of National City. He did not talk theology or religion. He was sensible and good-natured—a genial companion. A peddler, a kind of universal genius, a Yankee from Halifax, a traveler in every state in the Union, happened along about evening, and after supper he sang and told many stories, comical and romantic, until bedtime. It was quite an entertainment.

Buckman returned the next day—Thanksgiving day, according to the president's proclamation. Buckman is a philosopher. He has been fighting his way in this country for nearly thirty years. His career is a varied and adventurous one. He is pretty well known throughout California. He discovered the famous Napa springs, but lost possession through "legalized robbery." Afterward he discovered these springs and made his home in this mountain recess. He is a born unbeliever, he says. Like Abe Lincoln, he can tell stories by the hour of various happenings. He says one need not believe all his stories, but the "coon story" one must believe. He killed three coons at one shot. This beats the record. The coons were up in a tree. As he looked, the coons arranged in triangular fashion, it occurred to him that if he shot at the hole between them the shot would scatter and hit all three. He tried it, and succeeded admirably; and that is the way he killed three coons at "one fell stroke."

Buckman is seventy-two years old, but he keeps hard at work. Mrs. Buckman and Mrs. Mary Pierce, her sister, are of this pleasant family circle where Freethought prevails. I could not hav passed a few days of rest amidst more congenial surroundings.

But I must hasten to work. Friday I return to Descanso, ready to take the stage on Saturday morning. I enroll John Coombs in THE TRUTH SEEKER ranks, and I hope to take a trip into this wild and attractiv country again. It is an experience unique and interesting. Saturday is a glorious golden day. From Descanso we mount the hills, and from a hight of five thousand feet, in the morning's glory, gaze upon the wonderful panorama spread out to the sparkling sea fifty miles away. Swiftly we speed through the charming valleys. At 4 o'clock in the afternoon I am in San Diego.

Saturday evening there is a delightful gathering at the house of Judge Thomas, and the universe and humanity are discussed from almost every point of view by broad and cultivated minds. I hav thus had a week of varied work and pleasure. I hav seen nature in her wildest, grandest, and most beautiful forms, and hav touched the hights of human reason and imagination. The pathway of Freethought is hard and rugged in many respects, but after all what a wealth of joy it givs in the contemplation of nature in its real magnificence and actual grace; and in association with humanity in sublime and inspiring thoughts, and sympathy with every hope and aspiration that springs from truth itself.

San Diego, Nov. 29, 1891. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

At the Manhattan Liberal Club.

The Manhattan Liberal Club still livs, but it has been a long time since a TRUTH SEEKER reporter paid a nickel to Treasurer Allen for the privilege of listening to the wisdom of Wakeman and Weeks and the foolish remarks of everybody else. That is, according to Messrs. W. and W. The club has slightly changed its characteristics within two or three years. In the days of the presidency of Horace Greeley, Courtlandt Palmer, and James Parton, though Mr. Parton was never there, the club was almost wholly American. Last Friday night most of the speakers were born across the ocean, and some of them were rather recent, though desirable, importations. Two-thirds of the audience bore a foreign stamp upon their faces. It looks as if Americans are too busy chasing the almighty dollar to pursue the search for Truth which alone leads people to frequent the Manhattan Liberal Club. A few of the old attendants were there, however. Mr. Allen took the shining five-cent pieces at the door; Dr. Foote smiled down upon all alike; Mr. Eckert, with his chum John, was in the same old northwest corner of the hall, looking plump and prosperous as becomes a landed proprietor and capitalist; Mr. Chamberlain was there, reminiscent of the recent Secular Union congress at Philadelphia, and George Francis Train sat at the reporters' table, a big bouquet in his buttonhole, and a pencil frequently in his hand to ask paper questions and make suggestions to the scribe. Dr. Gunn was in the chair, and he, too, looked prosperous. Perhaps his connection with Joe Britton, Comstock's discharged spy who has set up in business for himself, has brought him wealth if not reputation.

Clegg Wright's subject was "Individualism versus Socialism." He did not think, he said, that he could instruct the Manhattan Liberal Club, but should consider himself fairly successful if he said anything to arouse its intellectual acuteness, and to that end he hoped the club would on this evening be blessed with a copious measure of divine afflatus. Mr. Wright is a small gentleman with a four-story head, of nervous temperament, and an ardent Spiritualistic orator. He is an evolutionist, inclined to religious heresy. Sometimes he speaks under control, but on this occasion he spoke as himself. His discourse was an affirmation of evolution of the race through natural selection. Nature, he said, was a great butcher-shop. Between death and birth there was a persistent conflict. To liv we hav to fight, and the man who cannot fight well goes to the wall. But this struggle for existence is necessary for the development of the best and highest existence—civilization, by which he meant the development of the artistic and philosophical in man. Primitiv man was not a philosopher, as he had probably descended from an ancestor who lived in a tree.

Mr. Wright considered it necessary to remove the theological idea of God from the world, because God was used as a sort of big policeman to keep folks in subjection—some one to make people pay their rent promptly. This idea pleased Landlord Eckert, greatly, but he didn't like it when the speaker said that all rich men should join the church, as a church-membership certificate was a sort of diploma which made people stand better in this city. For Infidels, said the orator, are regarded as bad men, there not being a respectable one in the world. And the general Social Intellect said of a man with a new idea, Look at that fool! But the new idea buzzes and buzzes and buzzes, and finally the victory is achieved. The new idea becomes the thought of the world.

In the religious change from polytheism to monotheism there has been no idea not shot out of the gun of individualism. But you may make ten thousand ballot-boxes and you cannot throw out a great man; and it is doubtful if a ballot-box can even find a great man. Religion is the mother of politics. Each shapes the other. They rise and fall together. Our religion is one God with three heads on substituted for polytheism. Mills grind shoddy when brains are scarce. The country claims to be a republic, when it is really a theocracy. We stand to-day in the midst of a gigantic contradiction. The Puritans were bad fathers of liberty. They were narrow, theologically over-baked—destitute of imagination—theological lawyers. They had hump-backed minds. They were elongated creatures with a theological squint. New England was formed on that squint, and it is squinting still. Conservativ divines are now whittling and whittling away upon their theology, but when the ladies get votes they will probably put their God into the Constitution of the country, for when woman gets God wound round her brain, it is poor God, poor Constitution. The next priesthood we shall hav will probably be that of woman. But we shall never go back to darkness as long as the New York World can liv and we can hav the Manhattan Liberal Club. No form of government can remain permanent so long as a quack doctor can suggest changes. But could Bellamy bellow one thousand years it would still be necessary to bellow ten thousand more. Fools and philosophers cannot be placed on the same footing. There is no law by which a lazy man could be made as useful as an energetic and thrifty one. A man must hav something to hope for and love. Man's strongest sentiment is honor. It is the fountain of glory. All institutions must be based on it. It is the basis of morals. The standard of honor, however, in Washington is not the same as in Timbuctoo. You can't found society upon philanthropy, for a criminal may be a better helper of progress than a philanthropist. The sentiment of charity is weaker than the sentiment of honor. New York city is an epitome of the world, but you could not control the industrial conditions with the most extravagant militarism of the world.

Mr. Wright was at times considerably hazy and mixed, and it was difficult to tell what line of argument he was pursuing. In general it was individualism against Socialism, as individual effort was a law of nature by which the fittest survive. Lions and tigers didn't coöperate, but fought with tooth and claw. But his discourse, it seems, was intended to be suggestiv to the philosophers and others of the Club, as when the lecturer concluded he said that if he had not given them a chance to say something he did not know how. But he desired mercy from his critics as he expected none from nature.

Mrs. Donlevy, a fine little old lady with Liberal instincts, said the lecture was one for an ultra radical audience. Of course those not so very, very, very Liberal would disagree with Mr. Wright. She did not believe that our first ancestor had a creed. If Genesis was a fable, if man came from monkeys, then man had been coming up all the time, and had made great improvements in his surroundings. We had railroads that would take us to Washington in four hours. Think of our elevated railroads! she enthusiastically exclaimed, but the audience, most of whom had had cinders dropped in their eyes from the street-straddling monstrosities, did not applaud. People could see no more with spiritual eyes, referring to Mr. Wright's clairvoyant powers, than with natural eyes. We must depend upon the Eyesight above. Mrs. Donlevy defended the Puritans, regretting the degeneracy of the race since their day; asked the Liberals to be good to the Christians, and procure a national prohibition constitutional amendment, as there was no use legislating against individual cider-mills and kegs of beer, and then passed down to the music of the chairman's gavel. She is a very pleasing lady personally, but she lacks the power of expressing coherent and coördinating ideas.

Marie Louise, the Anarchist, went up the right-hand side of the platform as Mrs. Donlevy came down the left-hand side. Miss Louise's remarks were, she said, to be but complementary of the lecturer's. A government must of necessity be theocratic, because it was based on fear, and real fear is of something not seen of men, but superhuman, of spooks, as Mr. Wakeman would say. You can overcome the fear of mere human force, of bayonets, but not this fear of God.

The next priesthood she thought might partake of the characteristics of woman, her lovely nature, for instance, but the priests would not be females. Her sex wouldn't hav it. She had read in a book that some one asked Jesus Christ why he was a man, and he answered them, saying he was not: only in outward form was he a man: his essence, or quintessence, was of woman.

Mr. Wakeman said Mr. Wright's lecture was thoroughly bad, and, if inspired at all, was an afflatus from hell. He had thought that Mr. Wright really knew something, but his discourse was an apotheosis of demonism—of cannibalism. He must be joking with us, for no civilized man would say there is no morality higher than the acts of tigers and snakes. He never wanted to hear any more of this rot about natural selection and the survival of the fittest as applied to man's social conditions. This perfect savageism ought not to be tolerated. We should learn from the beavers, the bees, and the ants, not from the lions. The higher animals are all coöperativ—why didn't the lecturer mention that fact? It is infamous to say that might makes right. Mr. Wright ought to stop preaching this sermon, for Marie Louise was right in asserting that love is the basis of life. The man always believing in "my destiny" was an infamous egotist. Napoleon was an example of the "my destiny" doctrin, and he was a bad, bad man who divorced his wife to further his ambition. Government when in absolute control must be based on fear, but when government is but an administrativ function it is based on love. The true sense of honor was not what Mother Grundy said, but it was a devotion to the effort to be artistic and scientific, to be civilized and to civilize; and it is the Eternal Woman which leads us on to heaven. The lecturer was away behind the age. Marie Louise ought to tell him something and let him write another lecture.

Mr. Chavannes, of Adair Creek, East Tennessee, said there are a great many fools in New York. There is also one in the Vanderbilt family, who possessed much more cash and property than he deserved. It is such rich folks who are making conditions for tigers. The world is built upon might—it is the law. Organization should be based on intelligent sympathy. The Nationalist movement is the development of the sympathetic part of society.

Dr. Weeks, upon hearing these diverse and discordant opinions, cried out, "O for ten minutes of the Great Reconciler!" meaning the Pantarch. Borrowing one of the G. R.'s expressions the doctor added that all partial truths are lies till the counterpart is heard. In the doctor's opinion what troubled Philosopher Wakeman about the lecture was, the speaker was a medium, Spooks being Mr. Wakeman's great bugbear. As for himself he imagined Mr. Wright's control was some crusty logician—it might be Webster, for certainly the lecture was one of the finest pieces of composition that Dr. Weeks had ever heard. The fool and the philosopher, he thought, were not so very far apart. The philosopher often was a foolosopher. Socrates, supposed to be a great philosopher, reverenced law; but the doctor hoped there was no fool in this club who did that. We are all at times, confessed the doctor, in our fool moods, and the only men and women who do not at times make fools of themselvs are those who are such consummate fools by nature that they can make nothing of themselvs anyway.

Mr. Whiting said that if Socialism were a doctrin of love he would drop it. In his opinion it was a mere economical theory. Compare, he said, the construction of the West Shore railroad, private enterprise, and the new aqueduct, public enterprise, even with twelv per cent added to the cost of the latter for stealing. There is stealing everywhere. Socialism is a matter of economy only. Sympathy and love are trash, utopian ideas.

About this time it occurred to some one that George Francis Train had kept quiet long enough, and calls for the Madison square philosopher were loud. Mr. Train rose to his feet, hesitated a moment, and then went coyly forward to the platform. Mr. Train had been embarrassed somewhat, he said, by Dr. Weeks's differentiation between fools and philosophers. The doctor had mentioned fools and then looked at Mr. Gunn, then at Mr. Wright, and finally at Mr. Train, till the latter was puzzled to know who was meant. Mr. Train sided with the lecturer of the evening. Mr. Wakeman could not deny that life is war. In the ocean fish are against fish. Molecules are against molecules. In the air blood for blood is the course of nature. In forest animal is against animal, and nowhere is it worse than man against man on earth. Mr. Wakeman had been careful in naming the coöperativ animals not to mention that red ants always killed the black ants, and that the working-bees killed the drones. Love, represented by Marie Louise, certainly is beautiful; but out on the prairies bisons had been fighting for cows on account of this love, till there is not a bison left. The Roman Catholics had always had a priesthood of women—lady superiors of convents for a thousand years. The priestess was the head, the Virgin Mary, of religion. As for the Puritans, they were the damnablest lot of old villains that ever were.

At this point Dr. Gunn dropped the gavel and Mr. Train dropped off the platform. Mr. Wright said in reply to his critics that sometimes a lecturer is misunderstood because of his incapacity to put his thoughts plainly and sometimes because of the incapacity of the audience. There was in this instance no doubt of the incapacity of the speaker to make himself plain. When we had a better breed of people we would hav better brains, and with better brains better reasoning.

The reporter was assured that Mr. Wright is a superior speaker to those immediately preceding him, but probably next Friday night, when the mother of Lillian Russell moves onto the platform, it will reach the zenith of its oratorical splendor.

Sad Bereavement of a Stanch Liberal.

The following letter tells with piteous brevity a tale of sorrow and bereavement that cannot fail to call forth the sympathy of every Liberal who reads THE TRUTH SEEKER:

ST. PETER'S HOSPITAL, OLYMPIA, WASH., Nov. 25, 1891.

DEAR MR. REYNOLDS: My little baby girl Mabel, six months old, died here the 21st, and my wife the 23d; my eldest daughter Bertha, aged six, is convalescent. This sad blow leaves me with three little ones.

My dear wife died as she had lived, a Freethinker, believing—In the brief daytime of life, love; and in the long night of death, oblivion.

Please announce in our papers, and beg for me the consideration of those who hav sent orders for crayons, for delay in executing work.

Yours in distress, EDWARD E. GORE.

We realize that all must die. No matter how fondly cherished, how precious to our hearts, how beautiful to our sight, all that livs must die. Love alone is immortal.

Death is the inevitable law of nature. A few more years—it may be days with some of us—and we too must fold around us the somber mantle of the grave.

From the dark chaos of the past we sprang into existence. Earth that nourishes us shall soon claim us, and we be resolved back to the elements from which we evoluted. All shall share our destiny; yet a very little while and we shall sleep beneath the shadow of the clouds, oblivious alike of sunshine or storm.

Our loved ones die. We mourn and weep. We do so pity them, but ah! 'tis we who liv—we who are left to carry on life's fierce battle—who are left to struggle with poverty, to endure and suffer, bereft of those who made our toil a joy, and sweetened all our labor by their appreciation of our efforts to promote our loved ones' comfort.

Not for the once bright, beautiful, darling baby that is calmly sleeping the never-ending sleep; not for the dear loved wife, sweetly resting—all pain ended, never more to know care, suffering, or sorrow—need he weep.

Our dead—in any case all is well with them. But the living, that sorrow-stricken artist left to care for his three poor motherless little ones—he indeed has occasion for mourning and tears. Time alone can heal the grief-crushed, bleeding heart.

No need to beg consideration of those who hav sent him orders for crayon work, on account of delay in its execution. Every Liberal reader will feel to giv practical evidence of the reality of their sympathy; and exert themselvs to procure him abundance of work, that he may not hav added to his affliction and anxieties the cruel fear of doubt as to obtaining means to supply the needs of his poor motherless babies. To add lack of work to his already great troubles were to bereave him of hope, reason, life.

Address him, Edward E. Gore, Olympia, Wash.

C. B. REYNOLDS,
Secretary Washington Secular Union.

Lectures and Meetings.

W. S. BELL will lecture at Dallas, Tex., December 12th, 13th; Flatonia, Tex., 16th, 17th; San Antonio, Tex., 20th; El Paso, Tex., 23d, 24th, 25th; Phœnix, Ariz., 27th, 28th, 29th; San Pasquale, Cal., January 2d, 3d.

works of Rembrandt, that Shakspere of painting? What shall it profit a man to look upon the great marbles of the world—that marble of Venus de Milo, so perfect that it cannot be marred even by mutilation [applause]—the grandest tribute that genius has ever paid to woman [applause]: what shall it profit a man to gaze upon these works of genius? What shall it profit a man to hav his family carried aloft by all this beauty, to see all these things, and then lose his own soul? [Applause.] Do you think that God can calmly contemplate a workingman enjoying himself on Sundays? I tell you no. Let him stay at home in a tenement house, or let him go to church. Let him there learn that his chances are ninety-nine in a hundred of faring worse in the next world than he has in this." [Applause and laughter.] Call that recreation!

THE WORLD'S FAIR.

In this city we are going to hav the greatest Fair ever witnessed by mortal men. [Great applause.] A Fair worthy of Chicago—that is saying enough [applause]; a Fair that will not only represent your progressiv spirit, your great attainments, but there is to be a Fair here worthy of the great republic. And I want that Fair open to every human being that comes. I want that Fair open every day in the week. [Applause.] I want it open Sunday. [Tremendous applause.] I hav no objection to everybody going to church Sunday who wishes to, but I do not wish them to go to church for the same reason that the man had who went home about 4 o'clock in the morning. His wife said to him: "John, what makes you come home this time of night?" He says, "Mary, to be honest with you, every other place is shut up." [Laughter and applause.] I want every man to enjoy himself in the best way he can without interfering with the enjoyment of his neighbor. If Mr. Smith wants to go to hear Mr. Brown preach, what harm is it if Jones is looking at some glorious work of art? [Applause.] How does it hurt Brown? I say that any man who says that another man shall not visit such a place on Sunday is simply a monument of impudence. [Applause.] He liv's two hundred years after he should hav been dead. He should go back to the days of the Inquisition. Now, another thing: It is just as bad to go to the Fair Sunday as to want to go. [Laughter and applause.] See? [Laughter.] Because if you are imprisoned at home and think entirely about the Fair, how does that help the Lord? There is no day too good to be happy. There is no day too good for enjoyment. Yet when I was a boy most people thought Sunday was too good for a child; and when everything else looked out, when the fleecy clouds floated in the sky, and when, maybe, some bird sitting on a blossoming tree was singing, and the songs of joy were tangled in its tiny throat, some little child would be leaning against a tree and was supposed to be thinking about the worm that never died.

THE DOCTRIN OF HELL.

Now, where did the doctrin of hell come from? It came from this fellow in the dugout, and he got it from his animal forefathers. This doctrin of hell was born of the grin of hyenas. It was born of the eyes of snakes—snakes that hung in fearful coils watching for their prey. It was born of the obscene chatter of baboons, and I despise it with every drop of my blood, and defy it. I make my choice now to-night. If there is any hell I want to go there, rather than to go to heaven and keep the company of a God who would damn his own children. [Applause.] I heard a little story the other day about hell which is somewhat cheerful. [Laughter.] There was a man who died and went to heaven. In a day or two afterward he came to St. Peter, and said: "Do you know I hav had a great desire to see some men I used to hear talked about in the world. I was a member of the Young Men's Christian Association [laughter], and I used to hear about these men. There was a good deal of discussion about whether they were in hell or heaven. The most of us thought they were in hell."

"Whom were you talking about?" said Peter.

"Why," said the applicant, "there was Voltaire, and Humboldt, and Darwin." [Laughter and applause.]

"My dear man," says Peter, "they are all in hell."

"Yes," he says, "I thought so, but I've kind of got a desire to see them."

So Peter says: "You can go down there any time you want to and see 'em. Trains run regularly every day. All you hav got to do is to buy a round-trip ticket and go there." [Laughter.]

"All right," says the fellow, "I'll go to-day."

So he got his ticket and went. All at once the brakeman or the conductor hollered out: "Hell!" He looked out and he thought they were fooling him. It was a nice-looking country, but he didn't think he had got there yet. So he sat there while the others got out, and finally the brakeman came to him and says:

"Get out! This is the place [laughter], and we don't run any further." [Laughter and applause.]

A SOJOURN IN HELL.

He got out, and he says to himself: "What a magnificent place! Grass everywhere—billows of it! Trees, birds singing, and flowers blossoming, and fountains playing, and gentlemen and ladies riding around—O, everything beautiful. This is the most wonderful thing I ever saw." Then he saw a very tall man, and he went up to him, and he says: "Mister, excuse me, but what place is this?" And the man says: "It is hell."

"Well, you know I was up in the other place, and I came down here, and my particular object was to see three men—Voltaire, Darwin, and Humboldt."

"Well," said the man, "young man, I am glad to see you. My name was Voltaire when I lived in the world." [Laughter and applause.]

The young man says: "You hav no idea how delighted I am to see you, Mr. Voltaire, but is this hell? [Laughter.] It doesn't look anything like what we thought it was."

"You ought to hav seen it when I came here," said Voltaire. "It was horrible—brimstone, fire, smoke, and everything horrible, but you know every scientist for the last hundred years or so has come here. [Laughter.] All the genius of the world is here, and about fifty years ago we set to work to improve the place. [Laughter and applause.] We turned the lake of fire and brimstone; we conveyed it in pipes, and it does our cooking. [Laughter and applause.] We bored artesian wells, and we hav got millions of water [laughter and applause], the finest you ever saw. [Laughter.] The whole country is splendidly irrigated, and we are having what you would call in your country a real-estate boom. [Laughter and applause.] We are getting ahead of the other place. I see by the papers that a lot was sold on the corner of the Square of Public Glory for taxes." [Laughter.]

The young fellow said to Voltaire: "Do you know anybody that would like to buy my return ticket?" [Laughter and applause.]

FREEDOM IN ALL WORLDS.

I hav insisted that in this life and in any other man will hav an everlasting opportunity of doing right, and that there can be no hell in which a man will not hav the privilege of behaving himself [laughter], and that there can be no heaven in which a man will not hav the liberty of acting like the devil [laughter]; in other words that there must be freedom in all worlds. That is my doctrin. One tear of pity has in it more refreshing power than all the fires of perdition [applause]. There is more goodness in one ray of light than in all the hells that hav been conjured, more goodness in kindness than in all brute force possible to conceive. This doctrin of hell—as long as I liv I shall denounce it. I shall do what little I can to get that fear out of the human heart, out of the breasts of mothers.

Coming back to the question of Sunday, there is no day too good to be happy, and you cannot conceive of a sacred space of time any more than you can conceive of a holy vacuum. [Laughter and applause.] That day is the holiest day in which the most good has been done, in which the most people hav been happy; and I want children to hav liberty that day. The laugh of a child will make the holiest day more sacred still. Remember that it is as easy to wake your children in the morning with a kiss as with a club.

Let us enjoy ourselvs in this world; we are not sure about that other one. That boy was a great philosopher in 1843, when the world was coming to an end, and his mother said to him: "John, the world is coming to an end to-night." "Well, then," he says, "let us eat the remainder of the mince pie." [Long-continued laughter and applause.]

I don't believe in drinking skimmed milk in this world, with a promis of butter in some other world. [Laughter.] Let us get the cream here. Let us giv our children an opportunity to enjoy a little of life, and when your child asks you a question you cannot answer admit it. Then you and the boy investigate that matter together, and the first thing you know you will be intellectual comrades [applause] and you will like each other. [Laughter and applause.] Just treat them as you would like to be treated. Let them grow up in the sunshine of kindness. Let every man treat his wife as though she were a splendid flower and there will be a home filled with the perfume of joy. A home where virtue dwells with love is like a lily with a heart of fire—the fairest flower in all this world.

ORIGIN AND DESTINY OF MAN.

After referring to the fact that the northern continents hav produced nearly all of the great men of the world, and a statement of his belief that men came up from the lower animals, Colonel Ingersoll concluded as follows:

I do not pretend that I know how this thing is. I do not pretend to hav answered the questions of origin and destiny. I do not pretend to hav floated level with the highest thought. I simply say to that man: "Put down your whip;" to this man: "Unlock the prison door;" to this other man: "You hav no right to stand at the edge of the tomb and prophesy evil for the sons of men." I say to this other man: "Giv to others every right that you claim for yourself." All I say is: It is too early to write a creed. Wait until we hav at least one generation of free men, one generation of great and splendid women. It will be time enough then to write a creed. Let us hope, however, that we are going up instead of down. I remember that once when I delivered this lecture in New Haven a man waited in the lobby of the theater to get even with me when I came out, and as I came out he put himself prominently forward and said: "And so you think your grandfather was a baboon?" I said: "You are entirely mistaken, my friend, but I do think your grandson will be one!" [Laughter and applause.]

Now, if after all this, we are satisfied that the human race is progressiv, and that all ought to be happy, then it is only a question of time. I want to do what little I can while I liv to increase the liberty of the world, to hasten the coming of that great day when all men will be civilized enough not only to be free, but not to interfere with the liberty of others. I want to hasten the coming of that day when men will know that you cannot be religious without liberty, that you cannot worship without freedom; when men will be civilized enough to know that love cannot be forced, that it must rise like perfume from the heart—absolutely free. [Applause.] I want to liv long enough to know that men think more of deed than they do of creed, more of what a man does than of his theories, and I want to liv long enough to see universal and eternal liberty on the throne of this universe. O, Liberty! Dwell not forever in the dream of enthusiast, in the hope of patriot, in the prayer of philanthropist, but come and take up your abode with the children of men! I know not what inventions may spring from the brain of the future. I know not what garments of glory may be woven in the loom of the years to be; but I do know that coming from the infinit sea of the future there will never touch this bank and shore of time a greater blessing, a rarer gift, than liberty for man, for woman, and for child. [Tremendous applause.]

Obituary.

Samuel Gray, of Des Moines, Ia., died October 27th, after a few days' illness, aged eighty years. He was born in Franklin co., Pa., in 1811, and came of this place forty-three years ago, and was consequently one of the oldest and best known citizens of Des Moines.

He was a subscriber for THE TRUTH SEEKER ever since it started, and was not only a liberal-minded but also liberal-handed—a liberal-hearted man.

He leaves a wife and several sons.

The attendance at his funeral was very large.

The writer, after reading Bryant's "Thanatopsis," made a short address. It seemed strange to many, if not most, of the people to listen to remarks on the occasion without any prayers or religious flummery. W. S. BELL.

To Our Sleepy Liberals.

Awake! arise! the sun is up,
While you lie dreaming on;
And others hav donned their armor
And forth to the fight hav gone.

There surely must be a place for you,
And it's time you were on your way;
The past will count for but little
If nothing is done to-day.

There's a work to be done for the future,
Though mountains stand in the way;
Then waste no more time in dreaming,
But up and be girt for the fray.

The yoke and fetters are being forged
To bind both the young and old,
And they're weaving webs of gorgeous hues,
And reaching out for gold

To gild the fetters with which to bind
The hand and heart and brain,
And blind the eyes to the real truth
Till only tyrants reign.

How to Help The Truth Seeker.

1. When renewing get a friend to subscribe and thus save a half dollar apiece.

2. Get your newsdealer to display it on his stand or in his shop window. Be sure that he displays the pictures.

3. Get your newsdealer to keep in stock one or more copies, with your guarantee to take off his hands at the end of the week any that remain unsold. If he exhibits them the pictures alone will sell them.

4. Take a few extra copies and circulate them among your acquaintances. On your request, we will send you back-number sample copies free.

5. Leave a copy occasionally where it will be picked up—in the train, in the factory, in the meeting-room, in the cigar store, in the barber-shop. Leave it picture-side up.

6. Keep in your pocket some of our cheap tracts and when convenient hand one to a friend.

7. Get a new subscriber by persuading some friend to take it.

Land-Robbery.

Friends of justice, listen to the truth. The greatest curse from which the human race has suffered has been land-robbery. The earth is one of the elements from which we must draw our support, and every man, and woman too, has just the same natural birthright to land enough to build a home and raise their food on that they hav to sunlight, air, water, or life itself. And any man or government that robs any man of that right is as guilty of crime as the highway robber that takes you by the throat and robs your pocket. If the working-people had arisen in their might and hanged the first president that ever sold an acre of land in this country, and every Congressman that consented to it, higher than Haman, and thus put an end to land-robbery at once, the nation would now be millions and billions of dollars better off, and the act would hav been more justifiable than any murder the government has ever committed.

Forty-five years ago, after lecturing some years on the subject, I wrote and published the first article I ever saw in print on free land, and then, without a word of help from any paper in Maine except my own, I got a law enacted to giv every landless man that would occupy it, one hundred and sixty acres of the wild land for fifty cents an acre, all to be paid in labor, making their own roads —the same as free—and now that section is settled by thrifty farmers that never would hav owned an acre if I had not got that law; and that county is called the garden of the state; and last spring, away here in Jersey, one of our groceries advertised thirty barrels of potatoes brought from that place; and while there hav been strikes among the laboring classes in almost every other town in the nation, nothing has been heard about strikes on that free land. Land monopoly was the enormous buzzard that hatched slavery. If no man had been allowed to occupy more land than he and his family could cultivate, there never would hav been any room for slavery; but land-robbery hatched slavery, which after generations of human theft, robbery, and abuse came home to roost. It slew near a million of the most robust men of the nation, and wasted uncounted millions of money, and is now spending millions every year in the shape of pensions, while the country is overrun with Africans, who ought to be in their own clime, but will hatch out another buzzard, a war of races, in the future. These things are but a small part of the brood that has been hatched out by land-robbery, and more are to come. I can trace to land-robbery as their cause nine-tenths of all the poverty, vice, and crime in the nation; and here in this village, where the church bells are ringing, I can find men, women, and children suffering for food, while all around and in sight of them are thousands of acres of land covered with brushwood, which they cannot cultivate because it has been stolen from them by government and sold to shylocks.

There are more buzzards now brooding under the wings of land-robbery and slavery.

The people are now learning that all hav a right to land, and the time is coming when all will hav land, and if the government does not soon stop all men from owning or holding more land than they and their families can cultivate, there will be another war as bloody as any in the past.

Then look at the slavery caused among the whites by land-robbery; three-quarters of the landless white laborers are now just as much slaves as the colored people were before the war. For want of land on which to raise food, they hav to go into the market and underbid each other to get employment, and most of them barely get enough to keep their families alive. If land was free, a part of them could go to farming and giv the balance an opportunity to get just wages.

Yes, a bloody land-war is coming unless government changes its course soon, and the government will be responsible for it, and when that comes I would rather be in a pauper-house than the shylock owning or claiming a thousand acres of land.

A Catastrophe Coming.

No man can deny that the wealth of our nation is gradually being piled into lofty mountains of gold and that the masters of these mountains are daily gaining more absolute despotism over those who liv in the vales of poverty. The few liv in opulence upon the golden mountains; the many inhabit the valley. The sight of the golden mountains is becoming obnoxious to the eyes of those living in the valley, who once dug all the gold piled in the mountains, but now can claim no ownership unto it. Were the people of the valley fools they would submit quietly forever, but they are not. Education is driving the clouds of superstition out of the valley, and men behold the selfishness under a disguise that explains to them the reason why the golden mountains hav arisen. Some time the valley-dwellers may tunnel the golden mountains, plant explosivs under them, and the accumulations of centuries may be scattered in an hour.

Subscribers.

The holidays are almost here. Are you ready for them? A gift that would prove acceptable to any Liberal friend, and at the same time keep you in constant remembrance during the year, would be a year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Your own renewal and the new subscription will cost only $5.00.

The Devil At Ease.

Old Satan sat in his easy-chair,
Smoking his pipe of clay,
While his soot-smeared angels, with busy care,
Were stowing the coal away.
A big tom-cat, with iron-gray fur,
By the side of the chair was purring his purr.

Old Satan laid his hand on his knee,
While a smile o'erspread his face;
He thought of a priest he'd roasted that day
For leading a girl to disgrace,
And he laughed a laugh in fiendish glee,
While he gently stroked his gray goatee.

He thought of a preacher in upper life,
Who had skipped to Canada's shore;
Of a Sunday-school teacher, who, with another man's wife,
Had left by the open backdoor.
And he rubbed his hands, as he thought with a smile,
"I'll roast them all in a little while."

A mouse-colored bloodhound lay stretched on the floor,
Amid the soot and the dust;
The iron-gray cat by the side of the chair
Was sleeping the sleep of the just.
"And the old brass clock on the mantel-tree
Had plodded along to almost three."

Still Old Satan sat in his easy-chair,
While close to his heaving breast
The blackened clay and curved reed stem
Of his half-smoked pipe were pressed;
His head bent down tow'rd the cat so gray,
"Fast asleep were they both on that summer day."

J. CLARENCE SAURLEY.

Opposit Economic Opinions.

Under title of "Some Economic Opinions," THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 21st contains an article copied from the Chicago Tribune, giving some of Colonel Ingersoll's economic opinions which certainly add nothing to his great reputation as a logical and lucid writer.

How strange that he whose sound logic and matchless eloquence hav led thousands out of the slough of theological superstition should yet be himself enthralled by political superstition and worship the protection fetich.

Had Colonel Ingersoll substituted the word Catholics for United States and conformed his argument to that sect instead of to the United States, as in the following rehearsal, the absurdity of his position would probably hav dawned upon him before this utterance.

Suppose "Catholics" pay $30 for a ton of steel rails made by "Catholics." Then we open the books and the account is: "Catholics," credit by one ton of steel rails, $30. "Catholics," credit by cash for one ton of steel rails, $30. That is to say at the end of the transaction there is a ton of steel rails and $30 all owned by "Catholics."

Now, let us suppose that they could hav obtained the ton of rails from "non-Catholics" for $25 Then how does it stand? "Catholics," credit, one ton of rails, $25. "Non-Catholics," credit, $25, for one ton of rails. So at the end of the operation "non-Catholics" hav got $25, and "Catholics" hav got a ton of rails; but with the other operation "Catholics" hav got a ton of rails and $30. It is all among "Catholics."

By substituting for the United States instead of Catholic the word Christian, or Freethinker, or even family, the same conclusion will be reached, so that it must logically be as injurious for families and sects to trade with each other as for nations.

The New York Standard, of November 18th, commenting editorially on this view of Colonel Ingersoll's, shows "that the United States does not buy, nor England sell, steel rails, but that it is individuals who transact this business."

But, if Colonel Ingersoll wants to keep books that way, he should hav said:

United States, debtor, to the expenditure of $30 worth of labor	$30
United States, creditor, by $25 worth of home-made steel rails	25
Deficit, $5 worth of wasted labor	$5

In buying steel rails from the English, we pay for them with American commodities, which cost us $5 worth less labor than would the making of the steel rails themselvs.

Thus, trade, like a labor-saving machine, enables us to transform the less expensiv exchangeable equivalent of an article into the more expensiv thing itself, with a saving to us of $5 worth of labor. And, as it is the fruits of labor, not labor itself (for the mere sake of toiling), that we want, why should we not as readily welcome the labor-saving effected through trade as that effected through machinery?

Even when we pay gold or silver for English steel rails it is exchanged, not as money, but as a commodity—bullion—being weighed just as iron or steel is. For foreign coins do not circulate in England any more than they do here. And gold and silver are valuable only because it requires the expenditure of so much labor to mine and smelt them.

If gold and silver could be procured from the earth as rapidly, in as large quantities, and with as little labor as iron, they would be worth no more than iron. So it is the labor cost principally that gives even to gold and silver their value.

Hence, when we can, with less labor, produce the exchangeable equivalent of a ton of steel rails, and thus purchase them, to legally prevent this exchange is as unwise as to legally prevent the use of labor-saving machinery. D. WEBSTER GROH.

Books in Fine Bindings for Holiday Gifts.

We hav a large number of books suitable for holiday gifts, many of them in extraordinarily fine bindings, and we call the attention of our readers to them, hoping that when selection of presents is made the list will be consulted and purchases made therefrom. Among them are Paine's works, complete, in cloth, $3; leather, red edges, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50; the World's Sages, in same style of binding and at same prices as Paine's works; Ingersoll's Prose Poems, in cloth, $2.50; half morocco, $5; turkey morocco, $7.50; tree calf, $9. These are magnificent volumes. Also his principal lectures bound in one volume for $5. Either of Miss Wixon's books, The Story Hour, Apples of Gold, All in a Lifetime, is very suitable for a present, the first particularly for children. Voltaire's Romances, cloth, $1.50; half calf, $4, is a fine and uncommon work. D. M. Bennett's Around the World, in sets of four volumes, profusely illustrated, red cloth, $6.50, is a splendid present to a friend or to young men and women. It is full of practical to-day information about other countries and the noted things therein. The latest book which the Spiritualists are discussing is, Was Abraham Lincoln a Spiritualist? for $1.50. Helen Gardener's Men, Women, and Gods is a work of great value, $1. as is Winwood Reade's Martyrdom of Man, $1.75; Gibbon's History of Christianity, $2; Darwin's Origin of Species and Descent of Man, and others of his works. A catalog containing these and hundreds more—Freethought, scientific, medical, social, as well as standard—will be sent on receipt of a request for same.

A Christmas or New Year's Present.

The "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book" in cloth binding ($2 50) is one of the best Christmas or New Year's presents a Liberal can make to a friend. Christmas is a pagan festival and New Year's is only a mark of time, but the Text-Book is a thing of beauty and a joy forever, and will help to rationalize the festival and make your friend forget the flight of years.

THE same principles of argument applied to disease. The devil had afflicted Job with horrible diseases, and might therefore afflict others. Great pestilences were constantly described in the Old Testament as the acts of the angels; and the devil, by the permission of the deity and by virtue of his angelic capacities, might therefore easily produce them. The history of the demoniacs proves that devils could master and derange the bodily functions; and, therefore, to deny that they could produce disease would be to impugn the veracity of these narratives; and the later ecclesiastical testimony on the subject, if not unanimous, was, at least, extremely strong. As, therefore, the more striking atmospheric disturbances were ascribed generally to the devil, and, when the injury was spread over a small area, to witches; so the pestilences which desolated nations were deemed supernatural, and every strange and unaccountable disease that fell upon an individual, a result of the malice of a sorcerer.—Lecky.

WE venture once more to call the attention of our readers to THE TRUTH SEEKER as a good advertising medium. Many papers subsist on advertisements, without having a half or a quarter of our circulation; and the reason why we get so few is simply the general prejudice against Freethought journals. Those who hav not tried the experiment are invited to do so. This journal, it should be borne in mind, is not glanced at and cast aside; it is read carefully and is often preserved, and its advertisements are sure to be noticed.

To the Friends and Subscribers of Freethought.

I sincerely hope that all who hav supported Freethought in the past will aid the work to which it has been devoted by becoming subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER. THE TRUTH SEEKER will carry on the work, but it needs your coöperation. It is a means by which I can reach you and push on the Pacific coast labors. Especially I ask those in arrears to pay what is now due to THE TRUTH SEEKER and place their names upon its list as cordial supporters for the future. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

To Our Subscribers.

We are in sore need of the amounts due on subscriptions and ask everyone who owes us money to be especially prompt in sending it.

This also is the time of year when a great many subscriptions expire, and an immediate renewal will be a favor to us.

Owing probably to the elections and the labor incident to gathering and marketing the great harvests our friends hav neglected to forward what is due us, and we are consequently compelled to somewhat urgently remind them of their remissness. As Mr. Bennett used to say under these circumstances, Friends, let us hear from you.

A Great Book.

Our Bible Picture Book will contain about four hundred pages, one-half of which will be full-page pictures and one-half reading matter, relating to the stories which the pictures illustrate. The text will lead to a full understanding of the tale, even as the artist's work illustrates it, with an electric searchlight brilliance unsurpassed by the torch of the golden goddess Diana on the Garden tower. Young people can learn more about the Old Testament and its heroes by reading this book than by reading the Old Testament itself. It is much more easily comprehended, and is written in more chaste language.

There will be twenty-six chapters in the book, twelv of which are completed, as follows:

I. Adventures of Adam.
II. The Origin of the Young Men's Christian Association.
III. Sustaining a Theory.
IV. Some Giants.
V. The Adventures and Work of Noah.
VI. A Hunting Anecdote.
VII. Abraham, Christ's Great Ancestor.
VIII. A Queer Family.
IX. Isaac and His "Sister."
X One of Twins.
XI. Jacob and Esau.
XII. Joseph, the Man of Dreams.

The book will afford many a hearty laugh, while we hav not forgotten to make it a solid attack upon the superstition which can venerate and believe the tales told in the Old Testament. So far as it goes it shows that book in its true colors, though of course we hav omitted the Old Testament obscenity in order to make our work one admissible in all families and readable by all ages and sexes.

The price of our work is $1. Orders will be cheerfully booked now and filled as soon as the work comes from the press.

A Sabbath Orator and His Oration.

The official God-in-the-Constitutionists who liv in Indiana held a Sabbath convention at Indianapolis something over two months ago, a partial report of which has just been made public. The convention was very small. The most interesting speaker, both for the facts he cited and the lies he told, was Mr. J. P. Mills, who spoke upon the "Aims and Status of the Movement." The aims are to shut up everything but the churches on Sunday, to prevent all excursions from cities, all trains and boats running, to suspend all necessary labor and punish all unnecessary work—in short to make Sunday as pious and stupid as it was in Puritan times and to giv the people over to the clergy exclusivly one-seventh of the time.

But the status of the movement, it seems, is not so satisfactory to the pietists as its aims. Mr. Mills stated that he visited the millionaires of Chicago to see what they would do in behalf of closing the World's Fair on Sunday. He found them all in favor of Sunday opening, and that every daily paper in Chicago was with them, as was the local committee of the Exposition. This, of course, grieved him mightily, and from the contemplation of its saddening aspect he turned to what he called the foes of the American Sabbath. These foes, he said, were

"(1). Worldliness growing in the church. The church has become rich, opulent, and sensual. In the more stylish and rich churches the services were turned into theatrical performances.

"(2) Love of pleasure.

"(3) Greed. The American father teaches his son this maxim, not as Solomon taught, 'With all thy getting get understanding,' but 'With all thy getting get money.'

"(4.) The American Secular Union, whose object is to destroy faith in God, and secularize the Sabbath.

"(5.) Last, but not least, the brothels of this country."

Mr. Mills said also that a large part of Congress was twirled around by the brothel power, the Congressmen desiring Sunday for dissipation. This assertion will probably help the Sabbatarians when they appeal to Congress this winter. But we should like to see the religious statistics of the brothels before putting all the inmates down as enemies to religion. As a matter of fact, so far as the figures hav been collected, depraved people like prostitutes and thieves hav keen religious instincts, are even superstitious, and always require the "consolations of religion" when in trouble. Corroborativ of this, read any prison statistics, of female prisoners in particular, for it is tolerably safe to assert that the female inmates of our jails hav been extremely unchaste before incarceration. We think that if the vote of the brothels were taken religion would get many times more votes than heresy.

Of the other forces cited as working against Sabbatarianism, no doubt there is much fact on which to base the citation. The people are evoluting. The churches are largely social clubs, and it is the social life which holds the members together. Most of them would not know their creed or disciplin from an extract from a sermon if read to them. They make their services costly as their purses can buy, enrich them with music, liturgical rodomontade, and call the conglomeration religion. Except it were the fashion these folks would not be Sabbatarians.

The American Secular Union is not at present trying to destroy faith in God. We wish it were. Faith in "God" is what makes Sabbatarians. It is the moving motiv of the God-in-the-Constitutionists. It ought to be destroyed. But the next to the last president of the Union was a Theist—a believer in God—and the present president maintains that the teachings of Christ are divine and impress upon the mind and heart the highest and purest morality, and will, even after the systems of theologians hav passed away, stand forth shining brighter and brighter even unto the "perfect day." What the "perfect day" is we are not told, though it is usually thought to be the "judgment day." But of course Jesus was not "divine" except as he was the son of "God," so the Union, as represented by its chief officers, cannot be accused of destroying faith in God.

And again, as a matter of fact, the Union has done nothing to hurt the Sabbatarians. Nor has it done anything else except provide a position for a secretary who put in all her time collecting her pay, a folly likely to be repeated this year. Everything that has been done to oppose the Sunday-closing people has been done by individual workers, and Mr. Mills need not be afraid that the Union will be any obstacle to his schemes. But he better look out for the Freethinkers. They will be found pretty near to him at the World's Fair and in Congress and they do not propose to let the American Sabbath Union ride roughshod over them.

Judge Zane's Opinion of the Mormons.

Recently we recorded the decision of Chief Justice Zane of the Utah territorial court confiscating a considerable amount of property belonging to the Mormon church under the law that no church in Utah shall hold property exceeding $50,000 in value. The chief justice was bound to obey the law, but about the same time he was writing his decision he was also writing for the Forum an account of the Mormons which shows conclusivly that applying the law to them and not to other Christian sects is an act of infamous injustice.

The only reason that the authorities can giv for breaking up the Mormon church is that its members were immoral in practicing polygamy. With any other doctrin of the church the state has admittedly nothing to do. But this institution has been abandoned, and the Mormons are now like other sects, except that they are a little better morally than most Christians. Listen to Judge Zane: "There are probably one hundred and fifty thousand Mormons in this territory, but of that number many are only nominally so. Amid the contentions between them and the gentiles, many hav sided with the church in which are their parents, relativs, and friends, without embracing its faith. It is idle now to think of disfranchising the Latter Day Saints. They are an industrious, temperate people, as a rule; and my observation has led me to believe that they are law-abiding since the church took its stand under the law against plural marriage. I am aware that now and then individuals will report violations of that law since the manifesto; but upon investigation such charges are seldom sustained. It would be strange if there were no breaches of it; there are some such cases among non-Mormons. I do not believe that such marriages hav been authorized or sanctioned by the officers of the Mormon church since the manifesto."

These are the people whose property is taken away from them, while the other sects, not a whit more virtuous, may keep theirs in peace. The Catholics, Episcopalians, and Methodists each own several hundred dollars' worth of property in Salt Lake City alone, but no effort to confiscate it is made by the prosecuting attorneys.

The treatment the Mormons receive politically is thus described by Judge Zane: "With the exception of a comparativly few polygamists, the male Mormons of proper age, who are citizens in the United States, hav the right to vote, and do so. They will not vote for liberal candidates. They must divide, as the members of other churches generally do, or all vote the Democratic or Republican ticket. They ought to divide on national party lines, and, if they choose to do so, no man or set of men is authorized to say that they shall not. Who shall say that any number of American citizens having the right to vote shall not organize a Republican party in Utah, nominate a ticket, vote for and elect it, if they can by fair means? The rights of such men are as sacred as the rights of those who would deny them. Gentiles hav said to the Mormons: 'When your church abandons polygamy, and you take a stand in favor of obedience to the law and disband your party, we will welcome you in with us politically.' But when the church declared against polygamy and in favor of obedience to the law and the 'Church party,' as it was termed, disbanded and its members proposed to unite with the national parties, the Mormons were charged with hypocrisy in so doing, and were told that they could not be believed, and that their object was political ascendency for the church through statehood.

"They were asked to do what was patriotic and right, and when they did as asked—without an opportunity to show by their conduct that they were in earnest, and without any evidence since then that they were not—they were charged with sinister designs upon the rights of those not of their religion; in fact, with a purpose to gain political power that they might deprive the gentiles of their political and civil rights, and heap wrongs and indignities upon them. In view of the multitude of counsel, of the disapproval and denunciation that the Latter Day Saints were receiving, the venerable man at their head remarked to his brethren that he often thought of what Lorenzo Dow once said of the doctrin of election. 'Said he, "It is like this: You can and you can't, you will and you won't, you shall and you shan't, you'll be damned if you do and you'll be damned if you don't." That,' he continued, 'is about the condition we, as Latter Day Saints, are in.'"

This treatment of the Mormon shows conclusivly that polygamy was not their only sin. They opposed the Christian church by being more Christian than the Christians, and they had to be put down. Polygamy was a good club to beat them down with, but now that it has been removed the Mormons ought to be given the same chance that other sects hav, and let the best superstition win!

To Improve the World.

The Christian Register, of Boston, the Unitarian organ, quotes with great approval certain sayings of Rev. M. J. Savage, of which this is one: "It seems strange that it does not occur to Mr. Bellamy that merely rearranging the relations among imperfect units is never going to result in a perfect organization. . . . A church, in making its highest and grandest aim the perfection of human character, is doing more than all other institutions to rearrange and purify the world."

This proposition is not original with Mr. Savage, but has been frequently reiterated by various prophets who delight to call themselvs "Liberal Christians." They think they hav stolen a march on their orthodox antagonists by making "character" instead of "belief" the leading religious catchword. And here Mr. Savage holds up that word as the sovereign cure-all of every form of social evil, inequality, distress, or wrong. Men must go to work and change their characters before they can expect relief from the burdens that weigh them down. We will test the proposition in the light of a few facts.

It is more than three centuries since Charron reminded the French people that whether a man would be a Mohammedan or a Christian was determined by the accident of his having been born in Constantinople or in Paris. But though this thought has been before the world so long, Mr. Savage does not seem to hav learned that a change in the relations of a man to his family and birthplace would hav made any change in his religious position. That is, he does not see that instead of character determining the condition, the condition determins the character.

Helen Campbell and others hav of late years been exposing the horrors of the slums in this city, Boston, and other places, where men and women are herded together like beasts; where boys and girls are growing up in indecent contact, never knowing the real meaning of a mother's care and love, or ever having the joy of a birthday gift, and where the reeking atmosphere of moral filth is corrupting every pure instinct. After these disclosures, the obvious and general conclusion has been that to check the vice bred in these lazar-houses it is indispensable that the conditions be changed which produce the pestilence. But Mr. Savage would hav us believe that these victims of unhallowed circumstances must change their characters before they can hope for any improvement in their condition. In other words, if these "prisoners" of squalid poverty had dwelt in decent homes, if these children had enjoyed proper comfort and care, they would be in character what they are to-day. Character makes the condition, not the condition the character, we repeat, by the gospel according to Savage.

The iniquity of chattel slavery once overshadowed this land—a condition for the slave in which his manhood and his will was annihilated, in which marriage was impossible and unknown, a system under which men bred slaves for the market, and under which, too, if the infamous fact must be retold, the masters begot the slaves they sold. Men and women toiled, amid reproach and persecution, for thirty weary years, to abolish this horrible system, and succeeded. The freedmen hav not had since then as fair a chance in life as they ought to hav had. But who will deny that it is still better for them to be freemen than to be slaves? But Mr. Savage talks as though the Abolitionists made a great mistake in attempting to rearrange the relations which held the slaves in chains. They should hav addressed these victims in bondage in the dulcet tones of "liberal Christianity," and told them distinctly there was for them no hope, and their shackles could never be thrown off, till they had changed their characters. They would hav to become virtuous, and learn to respect the marriage vow, and cease to liv in fornication, before they could enjoy any of the rights of human nature. It is by such philosophy that Savage attempts to overthrow Bellamy.

The fact appears to be that the preachers of this school find themselvs in a strait. They are between two fires. They cannot help hearing the cry of discontent going up all over the land They can not help seeing that great social inequality and injustice exist, of which thousands or millions are the victims. They doubtless feel that some amelioration of the hardships of the poor should be attempted. But what can they do? The men by whom they are in the main supported are sternly opposed to any change in social conditions, because instinctivly feeling that they then should not fare as well as they do now. It is by the present system they got their wealth. So the preachers cast about for a compromise—for a safe position where their salaries will not be endangered. And they find it in the word "character." They say to the mourning multitudes, "Do not seek to break up trusts and overthrow monopolies; do not try to get what you earn; let things go on as they are; simply improve your characters, and all will be well. Perhaps the next life will giv you some compensation for the hardships of this." But there is one man bold enough to show his colors. Brooke Herford, an English minister who has been for some years in this country, and who, about to return to his own land, thinks he may escape the consequences of his words, is brutal enough to say that his message to the lowly poor would be "Root, hog, or die." Does he dream of the indignant execrations that will follow him across the Atlantic?

A church after his pattern, says Mr. Savage, is doing more for the world than all other institutions. If a church can do such mighty things, why should the world need rearranging and purifying? We hold the churches largely responsible for existing unhappy conditions, and shall look to some other agency than that which has brought us into the pit to get us out of it.

Christianity Not Now Booming.

The Mormons are making converts in Michigan at a rate that is alarming the real-estate dealers, as they are emigrating to Utah and Idaho as soon as their faith gets fully settled. Hard-headed and stolid farmers are among the enthusiasts who announce an unalterable determination to repair to Salt Lake City, there to be enrolled among the Latter Day Saints.

At the other side of the world another superstition is being revived. The Buddhists are trying to convert India again. A few weeks since there met at Budh-Gaya, a town in Behar, about two hundred and fifty miles northwest of Calcutta, delegates from the Buddhists of Ceylon, Burmah, Siam, Chittagong, Japan, and Thibet. The object of the congress was to recover the spot where Siddartha sat when he attained the perfect wisdom of Buddha. To the Buddhists this place is like the alleged sepulcher of Christ, and like the Crusaders they desire its recovery and the conversion of the country, for like Christianity it is a stranger in the land of its birth. One of the newspapers of India, speaking of the new movement, says: "Under a benign and tolerant government, it seems, Buddhism is destined to find a place again in the land of its birth. Though its teachings hav been misunderstood for a long time, and denounced as nastika, a flood of light has been thrown on this religion of love—the religion of Pujahdasi, the 'beloved of the gods,'—a religion which inculcated such good and gentle teachings as 'that a man should honor his personal creed, but not blame that of his neighbor. He who acteth otherwise impaireth his own creed and injureth that of others,' and we are now in a position to comprehend its teachings in their true light. Educated Hindoos need not hesitate to sympathize with their Buddhist brothers in the object of the proposed meeting of their representativs in India."

Meanwhile Christianity is trying to revise its creeds, conceal the Mormon example of its own ancient religion, and become respectable and acceptable to civilized peoples. But it is not just now enjoying a boom to any great extent.

A Clerical Ally.

A year or two ago Rev. Mr. Jardine, a clerical star of the first magnitude, of Kansas City, Missouri, fell from grace—that is, was "found out" and "fired out" by his church. He died soon after—some say by suicide. Just recently another distinguished divine of that city got caught out on the fly. Only one paper in the place dared to espouse his cause, as there was nothing in his case to call for clemency. He not only transgressed the Decalog, but broke up a family, told lies about his own wife, and converted the church into a house of assignation. But the Kansas City Sunday Sun flies to his rescue and devotes columns, week after week, to defending him and roasting his prosecutors. The following is a sample:

"The pack of mangy curs barking on the trail of Rev. E. T. Bowers might cease their howling long enough to make a note hereof. Father Jardine was hounded to his death by another but larger gang. In fact, the case might be likened to some hunted stag, finally brought to bay, with all the hounds of the forest at his heels."

At this point is inserted a graphic illustration showing "Father" Jardine pursued by a "pack of mangy curs" with ravenously distended jaws. Underneath is the legend: "Some of Jardine's Enemies." Again:

"Goaded to desperation he one day, toward the end, cursed the crowd of calumniators who were pursuing him so vindictivly. And it is interesting to note, by way of coincidence, the careers of Jardine's chief enemies. The Times fairly led the van, and it has been in bad straits ever since and is now virtually on its last legs. Dr. Mumford has met with manifold misfortunes since, and lost everything."

In this manner the Sun calls the roll of about a dozen of the "mangy curs" to show that heaven is wreaking its vengeance upon them to fulfill the stipulations of Jardine's curse. In closing its eulogy of the deceased clerical rake the Sun says:

"Still he had a small and noble band of friends within the church who stood by him with rare fidelity and sublime self-sacrifice."

Jardine's case was even more reprehensible and aggravated than Bowers's, for in addition to all the rest he was proven to hav had a penchant for thrusting his hands under the clothes of little girls. This is the loathsome clerical leper that the Sun is engaged in making a martyr of.

It is just as well that Freethinkers should not allow their love of fair play and justice to commit them to the defense of any man or publication until they know the facts in the case.

We are receiving copies of a great many papers containing splendid protests against closing the World's Fair on Sundays. We hope our friends are also sending them to the members of the National Commission, whose names and addresses were printed in The Truth Seeker of October 10th. The local directory, we are informed, is all right on this matter, but it is feared that the national commissioners are conservativs. So send to as many of them as you can afford time and stamps all the articles favoring Sunday opening, and draw a big mark around the articles.

A few weeks ago Archbishop Gross, of the Catholic church, appeared before the city council of Portland, Oregon, and demanded the enforcement of the Sunday laws. He had a petition signed by about two thousand persons. But up to the present time the demand has had no effect, as the chief of police has too much sense to try to close the stores on Sunday. The Oregon State Secular Union, too, will oppose the archbishop in this matter, and President J. Henry Schroeder has asked Mrs. Sue R. Keenan, the vice-president at Portland, to watch the churchmen, and Henry Addis of this city will help. Liberals in the state should correspond with them. Documents on the Sunday question hav also been procured for distribution, and President Schroeder feels that if the Secularists of the state support him success is assured, and he also desires to make Sunday laws and church taxation an issue in Oregon's next election. His address is Arago, and every Liberal in his state should put himself in communication with him.

Letters from Friends.

In Union There Is Strength.

ROUSES POINT, N. Y., Nov. 23, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: There are quite a few Freethinkers in this place, and we are trying to organize for mutual protection and so that in case of death those who desire can be buried according to the beliefs they hav lived. Will you please answer a few of the following questions?

1. Hav you printed rules for the formation of societies?
2. Are there forms of burial services for Freethinkers?
3. What are the conditions for securing Liberal lectures?

Please giv any other information you can on the subject. Please answer through your valuable paper.

CHARLES W. WEEKS.

Laments Our Lack of Organization.

BALTIMORE, MD., Nov. 28, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I send inclosed my usual amount, which please place to my credit. I hav been behind in my remittance, but that is only attributed to carelessness. I regretted to read in your paper the unpleasant turn the affairs of the American Secular Union took at their last meeting in Philadelphia. It looks to me as if Liberal-minded people East are not for consolidation, but every man for himself. I hardly expected this state of affairs after reading the inaugural of Dr. Westbrook a year or so back in your paper. There appear to be too many heads, and each wants his own, and if that cannot be accomplished, then the downfall of the organization is the result. I trust, however, that the new officers will accomplish more in the future. Wishing THE TRUTH SEEKER success and a prosperous future, I remain, CHAS. MEHLGARTEN.

Fond of the Pictorial Method of Propaganda.

PITTSBURGH, PA., Oct. 15, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: In June last I sent you $1 for THE TRUTH SEEKER in order that I might become acquainted with the paper, and I being pleased with it, you will find inclosed a check for $4 to pay a year's subscription to the paper and $1 for the Bible Picture Book when ready for sale. Heston's pictures truthfully exhibit the absurdities, superstitions, falsehoods, selfishness, hypocrisy, rapacity, and persecuting disposition of the Christian church in such a manner as to strike the observing and thoughtful mind with great force. We look on them and laugh, because with the wit of their conception there is also exhibited in their execution just enough of the ridiculous pretensions of the church to make them laughable. Pure wit is not, per se, laughable, but when mingled with more or less of the ridiculous it becomes so. Hence the pictures are both pleasing and instructiv, and frequently attract attention when without them the paper might not. Truly yours, KRATAIGOS.

Has Round-Ups of Christian Calves.

PANAMA, NEB., Nov. 17, 291.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $4.25. Giv me credit for $3, and use $1 for the Bible Picture Book and twenty-five cents for the TRUTH SEEKER ANNUAL for 291. Watson Heston's picture in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Nov. 7, 291, is a dandy. Go on, Mr. Heston! Long may you and THE TRUTH SEEKER liv! The churches hav full sway here. I hav a round-up with them every little while. I tell them to giv the Lord a rest—he must be tired out listening to their nonsense. But they think it is smart. We got in an argument at camp-meeting, and one man said he had seen Jesus Christ, and knew when he was born. He said he was born on the 1st day of January. So he is the first man that I ever hav seen that claimed to know so much. He said all such folks as I would go to the hot place. I told him that we would hav lots of company, for he would be there to keep us company, and he got mad. I rebuked him for getting mad. He said he was just talking in earnest.

Yours, ALFRED HENDER.

If Our Sins Are Recorded, the Books Must Be Whoppers.

ADRIAN, MICH., Nov. 18, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Bible cranks, orthodox hoodoos, cling to the absurd nonsense of a record being kept by one of God's angels of the sins of man. The serio-comic posing and imposing is ludicrous in the extreme—silly and impossible to anyone who is not pickled with superstitious monstrosities. It is only the effete and knaves that indorse the fake. The whole religious structure is a hydra concern. It was conceived of hoodooism. It has neither father nor mother. Like Topsy, it "growed." Its origin is not known. It is a clear case of innocuous desuetude to record the sins of mankind to date. The mathematical quantities cannot measure the magnitude, and for the so-called Javah to keep the figures in his head, why, it would giv omnipotence a big head such as never occurred to the devotee of debauchery. Printers' type spread all over the universe would not be sufficient to print the evils enacted from the Bible creation down to the flood. Noah himself could compile a very large record of himself. The book kept in the vestibule of God's sanctum must be a whopper. Why, his bookkeeper cannot read. He never went to school a day in his lifetime. My Christian brother, a record of this sinful world cannot be recapitulated, even by your supposed infinit God. The so-called evils of creation are beyond computation, and why should the legions of man's infirmities be raked up, when a moiety of them condemns him to everlasting displeasure? This beautiful structure, the human body, fashioned after godliness, to be the victim of a benign, omnipotent, omnipresent, all-wise, all-powerful being we know not of, and when we do know him he to plunge us into eternal woe, because we performed just what he expected us to do—would not that be the quintessence of arbitrary cussedness? Worldly enactments of such treatment would be considered very barbarous and not tolerated, but with omnipotence it is legalized. He made us, it is said, and can he not do as he pleases? I claim he has no right with my body or soul, if I hav any. Death will demonstrate the soul business. We hav no cause to worry. Our information as to our final disposal is demonstrated every day by the deaths in our midst; that is all we will ever know about it. Bigots, can you cipher out the problem? O. S. BARRETT.

One's Creed Should Be, the Dominion of Truth.

GEORGE STATION, PA., Nov. 15, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $4. Send me the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book" and others as named. Giv Heston $1 for making the pictures. I am somewhat of a reader, and like common sense in preference to the Bible or theology. I became a Freethinker by reading the Bible. I take a great deal of notice of the sermons of preachers of the different denominations, and hav nothing to say against them as far as they discourse moral precepts. I see in Blowhorn Talmage's last sermon that he is at a loss to know the exact location of heaven, whether it is on this side of the stars or the other. If it is on the other it will be a long journey. I would like to visit you and Heston and hav a talk with you on general principles of Freethought. I like the pictures of THE TRUTH SEEKER. They hav great bearing and impress the mind. Success to you all.

A man's whole complex nature is subject to his reason. His creed should be the dominion of truth. We must judge all religion by its fruits. I would say, the religion that would develop the highest qualities of human nature and further the continued improvement of society would the nearest approach to religious truth and progress.

Yours respectfully, ALEX. STOREY.

A Hard-Money Man Writes Ironically.

SALIDA, COL., Nov. 20, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I would like to make a simple suggestion for the consideration of our government officials, after reading so many able letters from Mr. Brooks through your columns upon the question of money, exchange, etc. There being no intrinsic value in money except the cost of government stamping, I can see no reason why the people should be taxed for the support of the government when it could gather in the old clothes from the country, at a nominal cost, strike it off into money, retaining about five per cent for cost of making a good solid paper note, and giv to each man, woman, and child $50,000, and hav one of the richest nations the world has ever known. What a cheap navy we could hav built up and paid for in this wise way. This is certainly the grandest scheme ever contemplated. I wonder why the world has been filled so long with beggars, and starvation looking into the pale faces of so many millions of human beings, when the earth produces a bountiful yield only waiting and ready to enter the houses of the poor and hungry upon the presentation of rags called money, with nothing but the government stamp, which costs nothing, to impress it there. Can the gentleman of profound financial ability solve this problem? H. MURRAY.

An Explanation Wanted.

MARENGO, ILL., Nov. 22, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Replying to William Foster, Jr., I would simply say that if he can offer a plausible explanation why Mrs. Maynard waited twenty-five years before "projecting" (!) her book, as he expresses it, revealing to the world that Lincoln was a Spiritualist, which "projections" were corroborated by Colonel Bundy at this late hour, I will take my insinuations all back, and admit that they are above the weakness to which the average "medium" (?) is subject. One slight discrepancy I must note in your correspondent's communication, however, namely, that "there is nothing positiv in what the correspondent of the Chicago News puts into the mouth of Mr. Nicolay." That "it is all, I don't know, I don't believe things were so—testimony utterly negativ, which would be ruled out of court instanter." A greater prevarication than this, or a more willful perversion, cannot be conceived of. Let the reader look over Mr. Nicolay's declarations and see whether there is anything ambiguous or evasiv about them. On the contrary, they are most positiv and emphatic, and such expressions as Mr. Foster places into his mouth, as "I don't know," or "I don't believe this or that," do not occur in a single instance. Let Mr. Foster and his fellow-Spiritualists confine themselvs to the truth, and no one will then impugn their assertions.

An Agricultural Dispute—Milder Than the Theological.

MAKANDA, ILL., Nov. 28, 291.

MR. EDITOR: As your correspondents are now discussing the chess or cheat question, and as science settles all disputes by an appeal to facts, to this end, with your leave, I will contribute one fact that came under my observation. An intelligent neighbor built his house on a hillside. Wishing to hav a nice lawn in front of his dwelling, he built a stone wall some distance below his house, six or eight feet high, and hauled clay and filled up the depression below, until he secured the conditions desired for a beautiful lawn. On this made, virgin soil, in which there was scarcely a seed of any kind, he sowed one gallon of pure timothy seed, which was ten times thicker than that seed is generally sown. When it came up, the lot presented the appearance of a beautiful lawn. The next season the grass grew finely, making a good appearance till harvest, but when it headed out there was not a single stalk or head of timothy in the lot. It was all cheat! Now, if this chess was not produced from the timothy, whence came it, and what became of the timothy? I could giv many other similar facts that, like the above, hav come under my observation, but I will not ask space for them, as a scientific solution of this one will solve them all. It is an open question. Let us be courteous, and not overpositiv nor dogmatic. We hav much yet to learn. It would require a much smaller volume to record what we know than what we do not. There is no special hurry. Let us wait till facts are sufficiently in to justify final conclusions, then we can arrive at them deliberately and intelligently.

Shameful to Pay Men for Deluding Us.

WELLAND, ONT., CAN., Nov. 14, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav evoluted or outgrown much of the ignorance and mental darkness in which I was brought up from the year 1806 of the Christian era. But the great bulk of Christian religionists appear to stick to it tenaciously. But that it should be so is not surprising, for we are all what circumstances hav made us. Birth, early training, and surrounding influences hav all gone to help form our characters, and the Christian church with its organizations and arrangements upon so large a scale forms a business so lucrativ to its advocates that it is well calculated to keep the people in that state of mental darkness and ignorance that our ancestors were in eighteen hundred years ago, who were ready to listen to and believe any miraculous or romantic story. Nothing was too hard for them to giv credit to—Joshua stopping the sun and moon, Samson's jawbone and fox story, Jonah and his whale adventure, and many other legends that fairly outdo Mr. Gulliver or Baron Munchausen. And to-day in this nineteenth century we are told by educated men from their pulpits that those stories are true, and asked to believe them on pain of eternal punishment, and to pay them for keeping us posted in this kind of sacred literature. And I am sorry to say, they hav been and yet are being successful in thus keeping the mass of the people deluded, not to call it by a worse name.

A Plenty of Such Generosity Would Attract Workers.

HARRINGTON, P. E. ISLAND, CAN, Nov. 24, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $10—$2 to encourage the Editor in his noble work of emancipation from the fetters of priestcraft; the balance you will mark for the present to my credit, as I hav not a list on hand of the books I will order next month when I send in my renewal. I am not able to send you a new subscriber, although the signs are improving. I hav a good call for THE TRUTH SEEKER and some are quite interested in it. I am the only outspoken Infidel in this section. I hav many a lively time. I am always ready for a fight, and flatter myself that I hav the best of it. I hav had two sky-pilots come at one time on purpose to show me the error of my ways. That is three years ago. They hav not come since, and I am not liable to hav their company again. I find it no inconvenience to be an Infidel. ('Tis true, the court refused my evidence on one occasion.) I am on friendly terms with all my acquaintances. I make it a point to do just as I agree to, and all hav implicit confidence in me.

And now, Mr. Editor, I will say THE TRUTH SEEKER is grand. It suits me better than anything else I ever read. It is my ideal paper. There is but one thing lacking, and that is, we hav not enough from the fertil brain of John Peck. Go on with the good work. I wish you every success. Very truly, PETER STEWART.

A Bigots' Directory.

282 3D ST., DETROIT, MICH., Dec. 1, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Many thanks to THE TRUTH SEEKER for valuable information imparted. In the issue of November 7th, page 715, you publish the sad experience of a Dr. McCormick in the town of Aurora, Neb. Two of my brothers, a brother-in-law, and myself hav been negotiating with parties for a block of lots in that enterprising (?) town, upon which we intended to erect a boot and shoe factory, in which we expected to employ about two hundred persons, but after reading the above article we concluded to invest our funds elsewhere.

I hav traveled over a quarter of a century, and during that time hav found many just such towns; and I hav noticed that whenever a town is governed and controled by a lot of pirates and bandits like Aurora, sooner or later traveling men will shun it as they would a skunk, and will go all around it to leave it severely alone; and from that time on the town will grow smaller instead of larger. Property can be bought at a song. Let me giv you a few samples of that kind.

Let us begin with your neighboring city, Orange, N. Y.; Phillipsburg, N. J.; Easton, Pa.; Wheeling, W. Va.; Steubenville, O.; Williamsport, O.; McArthur, O.; Georgetown, O.; Dresden, O.; Piketon, O.; Woodsfield, O.; Barnesville, O; Cumberland, O; Powhatan, O.; Greenfield, O.; and by no means must we forget Carrollton, O.; Newark, O; and Zanesville, O.; La Porte, Ind.; Coldwater, Mich.; Adrian, Mich.; McGregor, Ia.; Wapun, Wis.

I could name many more of the kind, where people will say, "Oh, if we could only sell our property for half of its cost how glad we would be to get out of this God-forsaken town." CARL BLITZ, D.D.

Christians Would Make Us Believe in a Monarchy.

Nov. 28, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: What is meant by the term, "a supreme being?" The Farmers' Alliance has barred its doors against thinkers by making faith in a supreme being a qualification for membership in that organization. This shuts me out. I know nothing about any supreme being. I am a republican and want no supreme being. The constitution of the state of Texas makes faith in a supreme being a qualification for office-holding. Now, it appears to me that a man is required to believe that the universe is an autocracy to obtain membership in the Farmers' Alliance or to hold office in Texas. According to theology it takes three persons, combined in one, to make a supreme being. Neither Father, Son, nor Holy Ghost is supreme, but the three rightly put together make a supreme being. According to theology heaven is a kingdom and nature an autocracy, and the ecclesiastics want to establish governments here among men of the heavenly form. They would make of the world a kingdom, and proclaim Jesus, a dead man, its king; then they will elect vicegerents from among themselvs to rule in the stead of the dead king during his absence from home. Ecclesiasticism is the antithesis of republicanism. The two systems are like oil and water—they can be mixed, but they hav no affinity for each other and will not combine, and ecclesiasticism being the lighter material will keep coming to the top. The Farmers' Alliance was born in Texas where a man is required to believe in an autocrat to hold office, and a man has to believe in an autocrat to be admitted to membership in the Farmers' Alliance. Can you see no evidences of a conspiracy between the churches and the Farmers' Alliance to establish an autocracy? None are so blind as those who will not see. P. F. SHUMAKER.

The Fiat Money Doctrin Lucidly Defended.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., Nov. 26, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of November 14th, P. F. Schumacher, in an article entitled "Money," says:

"The word money can only be properly applied to coined metal, which is used as a medium of exchange and a measure of value."

These are the words with which the gentleman opens his article, and it seems to me that if it can be shown that the statement has no foundation either in reason or in fact, all his subsequent reasoning falls with the fall of the premis, and needs no attention here.

Looking at the matter in this light, and for the sake of brevity, let me, then, ask: Why is "coined metal" money? Is it because it is metal, or because that metal is coined, or both? If it is because it is metal merely, the justification must be shown by the enumeration of a quality, or a list of such, as is not common to other materials. If it is because it is coinable, it must be shown that no other material than metal can be coined. This, as every sensible person knows, cannot be shown, therefore the assertion that "money can only [recollect he says "only"] be properly applied to coined metal" fails of proof.

But the ground upon which the gentleman predicates his reasoning regarding "coined metal" as money, may be owing, not to any quality of or in the metal, but rather to something incident to it as such; value for instance. Well, "metal" has no monopoly of "value;" other materials that I could name—diamonds, for instance—are even more valuable, and, therefore, according to Mr. Schumacher's argument, can lay claim to be put upon the list as being available for money. The thing does not hang together, you see; it does not "hold water" as it were.

(I wish here to state, by way of digression, that the expediency of using for money one material to the exclusion of another falls under another category, and should not, therefore, be now discussed.)

Now for the fact, the experience; and I will cite but one historical instance from many such:

The Bank of Venice, which was established in 1171, did business for six hundred and twenty-seven years, or until Napoleon captured the city in 1798, without any specie basis. When the Man of Marengo descended on this bank he found not a ducat in its vaults. Yet so prosperous were its affairs, so flourishing its business, that the premium of the paper credits over gold had to be fixed by statute law at twenty per cent, showing the superiority of the government fiat over precious metals, which Mr. Schumacher would hav us believe hav the sole prerogativ of being money.

In conclusion, permit me to state that the idea that money can be made out of certain materials only is a barbarism and a superstition unworthy of Freethinking men, and of which they should rid themselvs as they would a pestilence. For of all the crimes that hav been perpetrated upon guileless humanity, those committed in the name and interest of the metal money fetich hav been the most appalling and disastrous. P. ROSS MARTIN.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., Nov. 26, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Millions upon the verge of starvation, thousands already dying from starvation, and how many dead from starvation we do not know. A mighty ruler of a mighty nation powerless to bridle the giant. Millions of Christians flooding every civilized land upon the face of the earth. Thousands of God's ordained ministers called out, separated from common humanity, lifted above their fellow-beings, through a call from the divine master to do his work—the work of one who said, "If ye hav faith the size of a grain of mustard-seed, ye shall be able to remove mountains." Is there not faith enough among all those that profess to be sent by him to do his work, to remove this mountain, or at least reduce its size? Or hav they forgotten to say, Let us pray? Is this the work of almighty God or the work of science? Is it the production of God's governing, or is it the lack of wisdom in man's government? We are taught from God's professed word that he sends the rain upon the just and upon the unjust, that he maketh his sun to shine upon the good and upon the evil. He saith that not a sparrow falleth without his notice. And he says we are of much more value. Lives are sacrified, hardships endured, death faced in every conceivable form, in the desire to find gold, or in resisting the enemy that attempts the invasion of our stronghold, or in the enforcing of principles upon mankind contrary to their belief, or in the endeavor to eradicate principles opposed to a creed, or to establish belief. But when the true principle of humanity calls for action it is of such a very different color from anything we hav been called on to believe in as such that we fail to recognize it. A call for war is easily responded to; a call for peace is easily acceded to if the weaker yields; but a call upon the bare principle of humanity, and that alone, seems not to be so easily acted upon. The sacrifice of our personal comfort or of our accumulated wealth, the disposal of our personal effects, comes harder upon us than the sending our neighbor's son to war. There are millions of dollars' worth of diamonds in our land to-day worn for the express purpose of pampering vanity, and not one of those that wear them ever experiences a feeling that there is ever a call for them to dispose of them, not even to feed the starving thousands that hunger had driven to eating the bodies of the dead.

These same wearers of diamonds would sit in the pew of a fashionable church and hear a sermon preached from the words, "Go and sell all thou hast and giv to the poor," without the remotest idea that it applied in any way unto themselvs. And he who gave forth the discourse, at the end of the sermon perhaps would ask for money to adorn that church or perhaps to help build a finer edifice. Great God, is there not in this world of ours to-day a heart that responds unto the divine principle, Do ye unto all men as ye would hav them do unto you? Is there none to respond unto the wail of anguish arising from the agony of millions of starving beings? Is there none among all humanity that can devise a way to reach them? Why not send directly to the czar all that can be raised, with the prayer that he see that it reaches them? Is he so far out of the pale of humanity that he would not accept? I may not be in conformity with the principles that govern mankind, but so long as there is one upon the face of this earth that comes within the radius of my knowledge cold, naked, or hungry, I shall never decorate myself with fine apparel, but every penny above the actual needs of life shall go to the destitute that surround me. MRS. COY.

Beautiful Language On Our Future State.

EAST RANDOLPH, N. Y., Nov. 18, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav read with great interest the "Letters from Friends," especially so Mr. A. H. Frank's, of Buffalo, N. Y., of Oct. 7, 1891. This gentleman wishes "D. M. Bennett could be in the editorial chair long enough to giv Wettstein a piece of his mind." Three years ago I visited the grave of this noble man in the beautiful cemetery, Greenwood, and standing there I could but admire the grandeur and purity of D. M. Bennett's character and unselfish life, and above his excellent picture genius had chiseled in stone these words: "Erected by one thousand friends;" below which I read: "D. M. Bennett, the founder of THE TRUTH SEEKER, the defender of liberty and its martyr; the editor tireless and fearless; the enemy of superstition as of ignorance its mother; the teacher of multitudes; the friend faithful and kind; the man honest and true, rests here." "Though dead he still speaks to us and asks that we continue the work he left unfinished." "When the innocent is convicted, the court is condemned." No, friend Frank, humanity's friend will never return to us. In his windowless palace of peace he slumbers, careless alike of sunshine or storm. Earth may become red with the blood of religious wars and rent with earthquakes, but no vicissitudes of time can awake him from his dreamless sleep. His career is finished, his conscious life ended. He belongs now to that vast realm whose monarch permits no sound, not even, friend Frank, a whisper or a sigh, to break the silence that reigns throughout his wide domain. Our friend Bennett is dead! He will not heed the conflicts and commotions; the convulsions of nature and the world's dissolution will be no more to him than the decay of the flowers I saw on his remembered grave, or the moldering of the granit that tells the stranger who rests there. Hearts of dust do not break, and our dead do not weep. Within the tomb no veiled and weeping sorrow sits, and from that voiceless realm the sea of trouble casts no wave. But, oh, how different with the living. Sobs and tears, sorrows and disappointments, cast their dark drapery and shadows into the sunlight of every day, and at its close how often we wonder in amazement, and ask the often-asked question, "Is life worth living?" But why grow melancholy? In this world there is much to rejoice over! And it is the best world I know anything about. This is a real world; yet the imagination often soars into the "ideal world where spirits dwell," the "promised land." I do not take much stock in "a house not made by hands eternal in the heavens." It is all imaginary, that is all. I had rather hav a house on earth here and now than a promis of one above the blue and the stars. Giv me even a little cabin, like John McGinnis's on the lonely banks of the Conewango—a cabin built by myself and daubed with blue clay; let me liv there alone, with the picture of the only girl I ever loved ever in my heart; let me wander down the winding path she often added beauty to that leads to the spring where the water bubbles out day and night, whispering a poem to the white pebbles, from the heart of the earth—a little cabin with some hollyhocks my dear matie planted at the corner, with their blossoms open to the sun, and a thrush making joyous the common air—I had rather liv there all alone in that little hut, with wild flowers blooming fragrant and beautiful, than hav all the promises all the Spiritualists can ever giv of a "home above the clouds."

As a matter of fact, has any Spiritualist ever investigated their home that they claim awaits them above? I will giv $100 to shake hands with my sister, brother, father, or any friend dead. I will giv any Spiritualist that amount who will produce the spirit of any of my friends and hav them talk to me. And if they can convince me, prove to me, that the cabin I hav pictured on the Conewango is nothing compared to the beauty and magnificence of "the home above," I will then be willing to swap homes, giv big bonus, and forever relinquish all claims here below, jump off the Brooklyn bridge at midnight, go down an unbeliever, and when the mournful waves wash me with the ebbing tide to the shore I will proclaim to the world I was mistaken, get on my wings, fly to the spirit land, and receive my harp and take music lessons of the Spiritualists. But until that time arrives I am perfectly willing to remain in my Conewango cabin. Truly, R. R. JONES.

The Pious Lie in Josephus.

HOWICK, QUE., Nov. 19, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Will you insert this for the benefit of Mr. H. Murray, of Salida, Cal.?

Josephus was born in the first year of the reign of Caius Cæsar, reckoned to be the year 37 A.D. He is believed to hav commenced writing history at the age of thirty-eight. Jesus Christ is mentioned only once in his whole work. In his nineteenth book of "Antiquities of the Jews," chap. iii, v. 3, is found the article that bears all possible marks of an interpolation. Here it is: "Now, there was about this time Jesus, a wise man—if it be lawful to call him a man, for he was a doer of wonderful works—a teacher of such men as received the truth with pleasure. He drew over to him both many of the Jews and many of the gentiles. He was [the] Christ; and when Pilate, at the suggestion of the principal men amongst us, had condemned him to the cross, those that loved him at the first did not forsake him, for he appeared unto them alive again the third day, as the divine prophets had foretold these and ten thousand other wonderful things concerning him; and the tribe of Christians, so named from him, are not extinct at this day."

Note the language used. First: "Pilate, at the suggestion of the principal men amongst us"—indicating an act of very recent occurrence. And then: "And the tribe of Christians, so named from him, are not extinct at this day"—showing that the writer forgot that he was personating an ancient historian, and instinctivly used an expression that could not hav been used by Josephus while writing an event of very recent occurrence. It is also noted that this chapter iii looks more sensible with this piece left out. Again, it is impossible to believe this piece genuin without also believing that Josephus, the learned and authentic Jewish historian, the celebrated warrior and governor of Juda, was such an incredible fool as to admit that Jesus was God and yet refuse his religion. Indeed, some zealous Christian writers call Josephus an Ebionite Christian, but there is absolutely nothing in all his writings to warrant such an assumption. The interpolator himself could not believe Josephus a Christian, or he would not hav made him say, "The tribe of Christians, so named from him, are not extinct to this day." Again, it is quite sure that if Josephus had known Christ he would hav said much more about him. He would hav mentioned some of his wonderful works. He would hav mentioned the great earthquake, the wonderful darkness, when he was crucified. Josephus shows no partiality for the tyrannical Herod. He givs us a very complete enumeration of his misdeeds. If there was any truth in the Christian claim that he put all male children to death under two years of age in order to destroy Jesus, Josephus would hav recorded that cruel act along with the rest.

In an appendix, the translator, a zealous Christian, has three dissertations in which he tries to prove the real existence of Jesus Christ, and he only succeeds in showing that Josephus never mentioned Jesus at all. He quotes Tacitus, who wrote A.D. 110; Justin Martyr, A.D. 147; Origen, A.D. 230, and another who wrote about A.D. 250, none of whom knew anything about the contested verse in Josephus. Then he quotes Eusebius, A.D. 324, who for the first time makes mention of the contested verse. Evidently he, the zealous instrument of Constantine, the perjurer and murderer, was the interpolator. It is quite evident that Josephus did not know Jesus, consequently Jesus was not there at the time alleged, unless he was one of the many thousands whom Pilate put to death for sedition and was, like the rest of them, too obscure and insignificant to be mentioned by name.

Judging the origin of Christianity by the works of Josephus, it would seem to hav started about 100 B.C. in a sedition by a Jew named Sadduc. His descendants kept stirring up the same political and religious innovations, called seditions, all along down to the days of Josephus. The same Sadduc is given in the gospel of Matthew as the seventh ancestor of Jesus Christ. This would bring the Christian date about right, but it is not indorsed by Josephus. I do find in Josephus that one of Sadduc's descendants was named Jesus, but he lived too early to be Matthew's Jesus; besides, he was not the son of Joseph, but was the son of Sapphias; otherwise he might answer the description pretty well, as Josephus says that he was the leader of a seditious tumult of mariners and poor people, and took with him certain Galileeans to set the palace on fire. Josephus also mentions "John" beheaded by Herod, not under the circumstances mentioned by Christians, but simply on account of a political difference. In mentioning John the Baptist, the Baptist is in italic, indicating that it is added by the translator; and James the Just, the brother of Jesus called Christ, is also in italic.

In the aforesaid contested piece I see two words—"divine prophets"—which cannot be found again in all the works of Josephus. The expression was undoubtedly coined after the days of Josephus.

There is no other mention of Christ or his religion than what I hav stated in all the works of Josephus.

Yours truly, CHAS. LAPERCHE.

Travesty

ON "BUSYBODIES," IN THE TRUTH SEEKER, NOV. 14, 1891.

It is a fact, as I've been told,
That people in the days of old
Got rich in silver and in gold—
Their coffers full as they could hold—
By minding others' business.

They did their worst to wound the fame
Of all, no matter what his name;
They filched from all who went and came;
They pleased themselvs—all did the same,
As if 'twas proper business.

And if a man did what was right
From day to day with all his might,
He'd soon be put in sorry plight
By some old pug-nosed blatherskite
Who had no other business.

And now, in our more modern days,
There is some change in people's ways;
Though men a hue and cry may raise
'Bout former times, and paraphrase
'Bout "minding our own business."

We hav a right to come and go
And find out what our neighbors do,
And buy fine things to make a show;
And, Jehu-like, run to and fro
To mind our neighbors' business.

So, if we take the pains to see,
'Twill not be long ere we'll agree
That, though there wickedness may be
'Mong all the humans, he and she,
Some tend to their own business.

But let us no more notice take
Of evil tongues, for goodness's sake;
Nor fret ourselvs a fuss to make.
Let's push right on, keep wide awake,
And mind each other's business.

Now, let this controversy close,
And mind our own and others' woes.
Though there be friends and there be foes
Who tread upon each other's toes,
Though every man may stick his nose
In others' business, and disclose
A selfish nature, and oppose
Much of the good as this world goes,
And—well, really, I suppose
We'll hav to tend to business.

B. F. Robbins.

A Chapter from Life.

Although I am an old man, upward of eighty, I like, when The Truth Seeker comes and I take a glance at its solid contents, to run down into the Corner and romp a while with Susan Wixon and her bright family of boys and girls. I am always glad to see anything in her school which tends to bring her scholars into closer communion with our Mother Nature as she shows herself in the plant and animal worlds. I say communion because we human beings who stand at the head of the list, hav all our things in common with the plants and animals, so that I mean no indignity to the human race when I say that man is no more than an animal who, because he is highly improved in his intellect, looks down upon, and exercises control over, all the rest of his fellow-beings. I think the flowers, and the trees, and indeed the whole family of plants, hav more or less mind according to their needs; for their bodies are as well organized as ours and they do everything we do except one. They are anchored fast in the ground. They cannot leave their homes and travel on horseback or in the railroad cars, as we can. But they send their children abroad as representativs, many of them on the wings of the wind, and in divers other strange ways. The world of animals, as we still call them, we know more about, since we can look into their eyes, and having vocal organs, we can hear them talk after their manner, and hold conversations with them. Jacob Heaton, a life-long friend of mine, who lived and died at Salem, O., always became very much attached to his horses and they to him, because he was very kind and considerate to them. He would hold long conversations with them, especially about oats, and grass, and sometimes about the taste of sugar, concerning which most horses hav decided opinions. When in harness, Mr. Heaton, as every driver ought, controled his horse more by his voice than by the rein or whip; for although not loud, it was very emphatic. He had a horse named Duncan, who could go as fast, or as slowly, as his owner pleased. On the occasion of one of my frequent visits, he took me out for a ride in his buggy. When we got to a nice level piece of road, he said to the horse: "Now, Duncan, show Mr. B. how you can trot. Off you go!" And off he did go. Being a farmer nearly all my life, I hav raised many horses, but they were not fast, and when Duncan started he nearly frightened me out of my wits, for, as the profane would say, he went as if the devil was after him. Mr. Heaton, seeing I was scared, said: "There, Duncan, that will do," and the horse quieted down to a common gait.

In process of time Mr. Heaton sold this horse and got another; and several years elapsed, when a curious incident occurred which is worth relating. Mr. Heaton was on a visit to Philadelphia, and on walking up Chestnut street one day in company with a friend, with whom he was conversing in his usual loud and emphatic way, he heard the whinny of a horse, hitched to a doctor's buggy on the other side of the street, and in a moment more, to the surprise of the spectators, the horse and buggy, without a driver, came over to where Mr. Heaton was. It was Duncan! He had heard Mr. Heaton's voice, and recognized it as that of an old friend, and came over to renew the acquaintance. Mr. Heaton recognized him also, and was patting him on the neck and talking to him, when the doctor coming down from his patient, and finding his horse and buggy on the other side of the street from where he had left him, went over to the crowd to see what had happened. Then Mr. Heaton explained the phenomenon by saying that he lived in Ohio, four hundred miles from Philadelphia, and once owned the horse, and that, having been mutual friends, they had accidentally met after years of separation to renew, for a few moments, their old friendship.

I hav frequently been asked by visitors why I do not sell my farm and go with my family to a city, where I can hav plenty of company, hear good music, and see persons and things which I cannot see in the country. But I tell them that a city to us would be what an unbroken forest would be to them—a penitentiary. It is I who, as a farmer, liv in a large world filled with the most beautiful and wonderful things to see and study. The book of Nature has a thousand pages, and every one is full of interest and instruction, so that a farmer's family, if they be intelligent, and hav the divine hunger for knowledge, are never troubled with what the French call ennui, which means weariness and disgust with having nothing to do. Some years ago we had a visit from a city lady, who had been a schoolmate of Mrs. B., and who had seldom or never seen either a sunrise or sunset. It was in the month of May, and the time for hatching chickens. One of the children had brought from the barn a fully matured chick, which, not being able to break the shell, had died. The child opened the shell and put the chick into the lady's hand for examination. She was in raptures over its beautiful feet, and observed with astonishment that its head was beneath its wing. Then she finished her silent musing by expressing her wonder—just as a well-educated city ignoramus would—how in the world the chick got inside the shell!

On another occasion, standing among a flock of turkeys and chickens, the lady was struck with their keen eyes, and was surprised when she was told that neither a turkey nor a chicken ever winked with its eyelids from the moment in the early morning when it removed its head from behind its wing till it went to roost at night. Then one of the girls took up a hen and showed how in the corner of its eye there was a nictitating membrane, with which, like a weaver's shuttle, but with the quickness of the lightning's flash, the hen could keep her eye moist and free from dust.

Legend Continued.

Dear Young Friends: Seth, Jane, and the raven continued to work very hard for rich Christians without collecting any funds. Poor, hungry Seth was lying under a tree. "Dear Ravy," said he to the raven, "could you not frighten them a little?" "I will try," thought the good bird, his eye growing bright.

He flew to a palace, almost where the dinner was ready. Mr. Smith was there, who took the sacrament three times a month. He was keeper of an asylum, with a large salary, but no vacant seat at his table for the poor; the rich were present there every day, to share with him all the luxuries of the season, while disgusting scraps were sent to the rooms of the helpless, suffering persons.

Nothing could exceed the elegance of that dining-room; but even the most holy and hardened trembled when they saw the outline of a skeleton seated in a shaded place with costly china, silver, and crystal before him. Mr. Brown came in, boasting loudly of benevolence, who had erected a cheap, showy building, into which the poor were driven like cattle, and kept in a hungry, wretched condition. The throng of visitors was so great the most industrious persons were unable to earn their living. All they thought of was to get away from such a useless, savage place. Sweet manners and politeness would hav made it splendid for business of all kinds.

But to return to our pious dining-room—the sobbing and weeping of suffering people outside was distinctly heard by all, but no attention was paid to it, except that the remark was made that street beggars ought to be arrested and put in jail. Two millionaires were contending about points of faith and religious ceremonies, men of vast wealth were abusing the poor, when the raven flew into the room, gilded and richly decorated, and landed in the center of the table.

Glancing round upon the splendid company, glittering with jewels, with fire in his eye, he seemed suddenly endowed with the power of speech, addressing them with weird and fearful emphasis. Every word was a hoarse and terrible sound.

"Shame on you! You are feasting, trying to excite your jaded appetites, while the poor who cannot recompense are not invited to the banquet. But your houses will soon be made desolate, and fearful calamities shall dog your footsteps. The curse of Cain will be light in comparison to what is in store for you. Even now," shrieked the infuriated bird—but the ghastly, frightened company, thinking that the raven was an evil spirit, rose from their seats and tried to scramble from the room. Many dropped down dead from some awful and mysterious cause, while others filled the doorway with corpses. Despair and horror seemed holding a jubilee. One man, worth ten millions, took his seat in a richly embroidered chair, cursing the needy in a vehement manner. He fell forward, dead, upon the costly carpet, like a slaughtered beef (a fact). He also forgot himself, and with his last breath cursed Christ and the Holy Ghost. A spirit seemed to enter the house, and with the help of kind servants piled baskets with provisions and other articles. Some of them glided swiftly to Seth and Jane. One was placed in the raven's bill, which he bore through the air, though it was very heavy.

Faint and hollow-eyed, he placed it before the children, who, forgetting themselvs, spent the evening caressing and feeding him the little that he would allow. Seth held him in his arms, entreating him to rest. Then Jane took him gently, and he slept awhile. Said she, "I wish—even if it had killed me." Said Seth: "I must go and find what to do with these things. They do not belong to us." "Certainly," said Jane; "dear Ravy thought he was doing right; he meant no harm." "I wish," muttered Jane again, "I had carried that basket, even if it had killed me." Ravy opened his eyes and looked happy and well.

The Sacred Bo-Tree.

When I read or hear something interesting or instructiv I like to share the pleasure, so now will tell you about the bo-tree of Ceylon, which is said to be one hundred years older than the great China wall.

It is old and feeble and gnarled, but thousands of pilgrims still flock to worship it, and each one is eager to secure a leaf from its venerable branches.

These leaves only possess full virtue when they fall of themselvs, ripe and mature, from the tree, so there is always an eager watch and scramble for them.

The bo-tree is said to be the oldest historical tree in the world, and therefore has an interest for us all.

Its worshipers carry offerings of cocoanut oil, palm blossoms, champac flowers, and the bloom of the temple-tree, and the ground is saturated around its roots with the oil of its anointment. One might marvel at worshiping a tree, but why not as well worship a grand and noble specimen of nature's growth, as the old myth of a Bible God whom no one has ever seen, and of whose existence there is no shadow of proof.

The tree is there and all can see and love it.

Aunt Elmina.

Correspondence.

Enon Valley, Pa., Nov. 20, 1891.

My Dear Miss Wixon: I send you a communication for the Corner. If it be too long, cut it in two pieces. What a field of labor you hav! The seed you are sowing is taking root, but it will not spring forth and bear fruit until you pass away. What though? You can be happy in the foresight of the result. You will prevent many from the necessity of unlearning in later years the false teachings of childhood.

Hoping this will find you well and happy, and with my sincere admiration for the work you are doing, I remain your well-wisher and humble co-laborer, A. B. Bradford.

[We thank our friend for his kind appreciation. Such words are always an inspiration and help.—Ed. C. C.]

HELP THE UNFORTUNATE.

Lawrence, Kan., Nov. 26, 1891.

Dear Miss Wixon: It is a long time since I last addressed you, but I noticed a letter from Mr. Cook in the Lucifer last Sunday while reading that paper. The extreme poverty he livs in urged me on to writing to you, in hopes some boys and girls could be persuaded to giv him a Christmas present to help him out.

I am now teaching school, and thus making some money for myself, so will send him $2.50 from mother and I to help him to liv. He has done so much for Freethought and humanity, it seems strange that he is left alone and neglected, while there are so many well-to-do Freethinkers, who should assist him to pass his last days in comfort and plenty. I will send more in the future, as will my mother and sister.

When I last wrote to you I was a school-girl, but now I am teaching, although I feel as though I am only a school-girl yet, as I am only seventeen years old. Many of my pupils are larger than I am, one older and several about the same age. It seems improper for me to direct those older and larger than myself. This letter, I fear, is too long, so I will close and hope a pleasant and happy Christmas and New Year for you.

Ever your friend, Annetta C. Palm.

[The charitably disposed may send contributions to our fellow-traveler who is in need, directing to Prof. J. H. Cook, Columbus, Kan. He will receive them with a grateful heart.—Ed. C. C.]

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

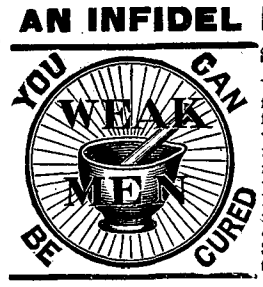
DONALD KENNEDY

Of Roxbury, Mass., Says:



Strange cases cured by my MEDICAL DISCOVERY come to me every day. Here is one of Paralysis—Blindness—and the Grip. Now how does my MEDICAL DISCOVERY cure all these? I don't know, unless it takes hold of the Hidden Poison that makes all Humor.

VIRGINIA CITY, NEVADA, Sept. 9th, 1891.

Donald Kennedy—Dear Sir: I will state my case to you: About nine years ago I was paralyzed in my left side, and the best doctors gave me no relief for two years, and I was advised to try your DISCOVERY, which did its duty, and in a few months I was restored to health. About four years ago I became blind in my left eye by a spotted cataract. Last March I was taken with La Grippe, and was confined to my bed for three months. At the end of that time, as in the start, then it struck me that your DISCOVERY was the thing for me; so I got a bottle, and before it was half gone I was able to go to my work in the mines. Now in regard to my eyes, as I lost my left eye, and about six months ago my right eye became affected with black spots over the sight as did the left eye—perhaps some twenty of them—but since I have been using your DISCOVERY they all left my right eye but one; and, thank God, the bright light of heaven is once more making its appearance in my left eye. I am wonderfully astonished at it, and thank God and your MEDICAL DISCOVERY.

Yours truly, HANK WHITE.

A revolutionary army is on the march in China. Christian missionaries are fleeing from its path. Foreigners and nativ Christians are everywhere in danger.

William II. on administering the oath to recruits of the guard said: "Recruits, you hav, before priest and altar, sworn fealty to me. That meant that you hav given yourselvs to me, body and soul. In the present Socialist agitation I may order you, which God forbid, to shoot down your relativs—your brothers, even your parents—and you must obey without a murmur."

Russians are dying of starvation wholesale. Epidemics due to famin are making ravages. Shopkeepers and landowners hav barricaded their houses. Foreign aid is declined by the bureaucrats. Prince Krapotkin says that "the Russian nation is now passing through a period of calamity which has had no precedent in history, not even in medieval times."

A mandarin in China says in reply to reproaches as to the persecutions of Christians there: "Why should Russia do the same thing? That empire, which enjoys the Christianity which you are trying to foist upon us, is doing just as bad as we are, if not worse. Its government is expelling foreigners wholesale, partly because they are foreigners, partly because they profess a different religion from the czar. It is massacreing, robbing, and exiling the Jews wholesale. Why don't the powers interfere? They are sending their warships to threaten our ports because some of our people hav ill-treated a few Christians. Why do they not send their ships to Russian ports?"

On the 4th a man entered the office of Russell Sage on Broadway, New York, and told that millionaire that he would drop a dynamite bomb on the floor if not instantly given $1,250,000. Sage backed away, and the man dropped the bomb. Sage was slightly injured, others were severely. A stenographer was killed. The dynamiter's head and limbs, and pieces of flesh of his body, were picked up by the police. The face is that of a typical madman. This, and the folly of expecting Sage to hav so much money at hand, stamp the fellow a maniac. His identity is unknown. The office was wrecked and holes were blown into adjacent rooms. Sage will hereafter be attended by a body guard of detectivs.

Some ladies of the Northwest protest against the Isabella statue at Chicago in connection with the Fair. They declare that Isabella did not believe in the theories of Columbus, and made no sacrifices, not even a finger-ring, but that his friend, the court intendant, borrowed from the treasury of Aragon the seventeen thousand florins to equip his three shabby little ships. Moreover, they say that the queen, who exiled one hundred and fifty thousand wealthy and intelligent Jews, the manufacturers, artisans, and learned men of the land, ought not to be canonized in marble by the women of a free republic. These sentiments will displease Catholics, who on the score of the supposed generosity of the fanatical queen hav been taking great credit to themselvs.

Gems of Thought.

No man in the world is learned enough, nor has he time enough, even if he could liv a thousand years, to find what books belonged to and constituted the Old Testament. He could not ascertain the authors of the books, nor when they were written, nor what they mean. Until a man has sufficient time to do all this, no one can tell whether he believes the Bible or not. It is sufficient, however, to say that the Old Testament is filled with contradictions as to the number of men slain in battle, as to the number of years certain kings reigned, as to the number of a woman's children, as to dates of events, and as to locations of towns and cities. Besides all this, many of its laws are contradictory, often commanding and prohibiting the same thing.—Ingersoll.

It is doing quite enough to compare the different objects which the Bible presents to us to perceive their inutility, absurdities, and contradictions. We there see, continually, a wise God conducting himself like a madman. He defeats his own projects that he may afterward repair them; repents of what he has done; acts as if he had foreseen nothing, and is forced to permit proceedings which his omnipotence could not prevent. In the writings revealed by this God, he appears occupied only in blackening his own character, degrading himself, vilifying himself, even in the eyes of men whom he would excite to worship him and pay him homage; overturning and confounding the minds of those whom he had designed to enlighten. What has just been said might suffice to undeceive us with respect to a book which would pass better as being intended to destroy the idea of a deity, than as one containing the oracles dictated and revealed by him.—D'Holbach.

In the past, the doctrins of Calvinism hav been a pall upon my joy. If I was happy, it was in spite of them; and often, after a period of delight in innocent recreation, an accusing conscience has reproached me with the inconsistency of mirth while the vast procession of human life was marching by to hell. It was not enough that I was saved; I wanted my equally good friends to be saved also. But they would not believe the doctrins; and, therefore, nothing remained to them but "a fearful looking for of judgment and fiery indignation." God, of his own free will, had elected me to be saved and had left them to perish. I hav no desire to be made so marked an exception to "the wrath of God." I am glad to cast in my lot with the great mass of intelligent believers in and practicers of goodness. I desire no better future than what they deserve, and what a just God would giv them. I feel like apologizing for having wronged them in the past, by estimating some of the best and noblest of earth as being among the damned.—Robert C. Adams.

You hav, O Adonai, made man "only a little lower than the angels." If this be so, how high are the angels? Talking of angels, I hav never seen one, O Lord; and I hardly hope ever to be one. But I hav seen pictures of them in religious prints and on cathedral windows. A species of them at least seem to me simply flying heads. When an angel of this sort is tired of flying how does it sit down? I can see nothing he has got to sit down on, except the crown of his head. Still, if by sitting on the crown of his head he glorifies the Lord, it is not, of course, for me to enter any objection. Well, you hav made man only a little lower than the angels. Do the angels eat one another? Man eats you or your son every year in tons, and drinks hogsheads of your blood; and some men (you hav made them only a little lower than the angels) eat one another. An English ship of war, the Nelson, recently visited New Guinea, also a newspaper reporter, from whom we find that Milne Bay is peopled with cannibals. They are constantly at war, one tribe with another, and those who are killed or taken prisoners are cooked and eaten. . . . Between eating you and eating each other, men should surely, Jeshurun-like, wax fat and kick. I mention this, O Lord, as you may not yet hav found out that there is such a place as New Guinea. You are likely so busy numbering the hairs of our heads and putting the tears of saints into bottles that you hav no time to devote to geographical research.—Saladin in God and His Book.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Freeman's Journal (Roman Catholic) says: "Let us hav schools supported by the communities in which the teachers of religion may instruct according to the wishes of the parents and guardians of the pupils."

IN the letter of a missionary in India that has been recently quoted a suggestion is made with most innocent gravity that seems full of painful possibilities to the poor Hindoos. The railroad cars there, says the good missionary, are so built as to afford a splendid opportunity for preachers, and the people cannot run away as they are apt to do when the speaker indulges in overmuch speaking. So he advises railroad evangelism.

A CATHOLIC paper says: "It looks now as if Hon. Benjamin Butterworth, secretary of the commissioners of the World's Fair, would hav cause to regret that he ever indulged in that stupid language he recently used before the Standard Club of Chicago, and in which he insulted the whole Catholic element of the country. His resignation is being demanded by all the Catholic societies throughout the country, and the demand is nothing more than proper."

THE Kolao Hui society in China is believed to import the mysterious and supernatural into its proceedings by the use of the planchette—a pencil being suspended over a board sprinkled with sand in such a way that when moved the point leaves marks in the sand. The movement is attributed to occult influence, and the leader of the society present interprets the signs, which then take the form in the minds of the members of divine commands. The planchette is, therefore, a kind of oracle, and has played an important part in many Chinese associations.

OBJECTION will be taken by some, perhaps by many, to the legend over the head of "Liberty," "In God We Trust." This reverent sentiment is universally respected, but it is as much out of place on our coins as it would be on the cartridge-boxes in our army. It is carefully omitted from the dime—a small coin that occasions more gratitude in the hearts of millions than the dollar does in the minds of many. Ignorant foreigners, too, may confound the "In God We Trust" with the "E Pluribus Unum" on the reverse and set us down for a polytheistic people.—Sunday Advertiser.

ALTHOUGH the Christians pray daily for the coming of God's kingdom on earth, the Christians of this country act as if they had sworn to prevent the advent of the Lord's dominion. They hav driven Christ out of public affairs with the cry that "There must be no religion in politics;" they hav expelled him from the public schools, which, they affirm, "must be devoted exclusivly to secular education;" they hav shut the door of legislation in his face, for, they insist, "there must be no partnership of church and state;" and, in their anxiety to thrust him out of his place everywhere in the world, they will not even consider that he has any business in trade.—Catholic Review.

THE Rev. Dr. Ryder, of Gloucester, has astounded the members of his church, several of whom are fish-dealers, by preaching a sermon on the question: "Can a fish-dealer be a Christian?" He described the "tricks of the fish business," as practiced in Gloucester, in a way that must hav convinced his hearers that the alarming question can be answered only in the negativ, provided they believed that Christianity is synonymous with honesty, and he painted the fish-dealers in a way that ought to scare them. Yet, says the Sun, he did not prove conclusivly that they are any wickeder than butchers, grocers, or milkmen.

THERE is plenty of enthusiasm and no lack of fun during election times in the United States, but we are icy and austere when compared with our neighbors in the Southern republics on similar occasions. In a general news dispatch by mail from Guayaquil to a Panama newspaper, the election in the capital of Ecuador is fully covered and curtly dismissed in this brief paragraph: "It is reported from good authority that the elections in Quito and Latacunga hav been very well fought on both sides, that more than two hundred persons were either killed or wounded in the fracas, and that the Oppositionists were victorious."

THE object of a considerable part of the Catholic clergy is notoriously and, indeed, avowedly to secure a division of the fund raised by taxation for the support of the public schools, and the diversion of part of this fund to their own schools. They are not making much progress toward attaining this object. The American people in general are very much alive to the necessity of sustaining the public schools, and are very well aware that a division of the fund would cripple them. Moreover, the notion of devoting money raised by taxation to the support of sectarian schools is entirely revolting to them. There is no chance that a division will be effected until there comes to be a state in which the Catholics are in a numerical majority, and in which also the majority are better Catholics than they are Americans. In that case the school fund would not be divided, but would be devoted entirely to the support of Catholic schools. That state of affairs would occur, doubtless, if we were to annex Canada and make a state out of the province of Quebec.—Times.

ABOUT a year ago, on a miserably cold and wet afternoon, a little dog crept through the basement door of 400 Fifth avenue, New York city, and stretched himself before the kitchen fire. He eluded the servants who tried to eject him and ran upstairs and jumped into the lap of Mrs. R. G. Ingersoll, who was sitting in the parlor. His utter misery appealed to Mrs. Ingersoll, and she determined to keep him. After breakfast on Sunday Fritz went for a run on the sidewalk in front of the house. He has not returned yet, and Mrs. Ingersoll is inconsolable. Colonel Ingersoll believes that the dog is seeking a happier home. He has not dared to tell his wife his theory, but he talked about it freely at his office in Wall street. "Fritz left the house," he said, "just about church time. Probably he heard some one talking about going to heaven through the church, and then he went to church to learn the way. Perhaps, poor fellow, he did not understand what was said there, and wandered about from church to church, receiving different directions at each one. Then he became bewildered and lost his way, and though I'm sorry, I'm not surprised at it."

The Ascension Myth.

Three days after the alleged crucifixion, after partaking of a sumptuous meal of broiled fish, Jesus is said to hav suddenly risen in the presence of a few of his disciples and ascended up, up, up into the clouds and finally disappeared from the view of the spectators.

But the question is, Who saw him fly? And by what means was a solid body enabled to defy and contravene the law of gravitation?

About fifteen years ago a man in London tried an experiment of a very interesting character. He endeavored by the employment of an ingenious apparatus to fly in the air. I was one of a crowd of spectators who watched him in his aerial flight. He flew about in the air for about ten minutes, then one of the wings refused to act and down came the "flying man" with terrible velocity from an immense altitude, and soon his remains, a shattered and bleeding mass, were taken up in one of the streets of Chelsea.

Thousands of people witnessed this scene. The flying man flapping his great wings was as clearly observable to all people in London with eyes to see as any balloon sailing through the air.

Now, if Jesus ascended to heaven—if he went up like a balloon in the air—he must hav been observed by hundreds, nay, thousands, of unbelievers, Jews as well as gentiles. Consequently there should hav been no difficulty in getting evidence to establish this point; for there would be no lack of witnesses.

But what kind of evidence hav we regarding this extraordinary occurrence?

Matthew says not a word about it. And yet, if it happened, this ascension was one of the most important miracles connected with the career of Jesus.

In Mark we hav an account of the ascension, and the writer says that, when Jesus finished his charge to the eleven as they sat at meat, he was received into heaven and sat on the right hand of God (Mark xix, 20; Luke xxiv, 13)—who, being a spirit, has no hand to sit upon—in this implying that the ascension took place on the same day, soon after the resurrection.

Luke's account differs somewhat from that of Matthew and Mark. Luke says that after the resurrection two of the disciples went to a village called Emmaus; that while there they had a discussion, and in the middle of the discussion Jesus drew near to them, but they could not recognize him.

On the same day they returned to Jerusalem, where they found the eleven gathered together, and heard from Simon that he had seen Jesus. When they heard this they related their experience, and while they were doing so Jesus himself appeared in the midst and greeted them with the salutation of peace. Some of them appearing to doubt the evidence of their senses, Jesus gave them ocular proof by calling upon them to handle him and judge for themselvs. After this Jesus dined on broiled fish and honeycomb; and having delivered a brief address, Jesus led them out of Jerusalem as far as Bethany, and in the presence of them all ascended up to heaven.

Luke agrees with Mark that the ascension took place on the same day as the resurrection. In the fourth gospel, however, John, we hav another account—an account which is distinctly opposed to that of the other gospels.

In John, Mary Magdalen is urged not to touch Jesus, because he had not yet ascended to his father; but he informs her that he is ascending—that is, that he meant shortly to do so; later on, although he does not request all of his disciples to handle them, Thomas—who evidently manifested a heretical spirit—was requested to stretch forth his hand, to examin the wound-prints, and be convinced. Thomas Scott thinks that all the evidence adduced by John leads irresistibly to the conclusion "that the ascension must hav taken place at some time between these manifestations, or, in other words, that some of the several Christophanies took place after the ascension" (Scott's Life of Jesus, page 326).

The same writer points out the scene described in John xx, 19, is apparently the same as that which is described in Mark xvi, 14, and Luke xxiv, 36—the time being the same in each, viz., the evening of the day of the resurrection.

But the expression in the Johannine narrativ that "when the doors were shut where the disciples were assembled, Jesus came and stood in the midst," implies, seemingly, that Jesus entered through the closed doors. At this visit Jesus givs his apostles, as in the synoptics, certain final commands and endows them with certain powers, but the mode in which they are given differs altogether. There is no command to go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature; not the least hint that they are to exercise the power of working physical or palpable miracles; and even the third gospel tells us only that repentance and remission of sins must be preached in the name of Jesus. In the fourth gospel this announcement of remission has grown into the power of the keys, and the apostles are distinctly told that "whosesoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them: and whosesoever sins ye retain they are retained."

Nor is anything said in the other gospels of the gesture or sign which accompanies the imparting of their power in the Johannine story. It cannot, indeed, be too carefully noted that, according to the evangelist, the apostles, as Jesus breathes on them, then and thereby receive all the effluence of the Holy Spirit which they need for their exalted office; and thus the fourth gospel virtually excludes that story of the Pentecostal outpouring which we hav only in the Acts of the Apostles.

"It must further be remarked that as in Luke, so here, all the manifestations of Christ take place at Jerusalem, and not a word is mentioned about journeys to or appearances in Galilee; and thus we are brought to the question of the genuinness of the twenty first chapter of John. For us this question resolvs itself into the simple inquiry whether it was written by the author who drew up the preceding chapters; and the topic is certainly one of very slight significance or interest. The utterly unhistorical character of the whole gospel has been amply shown, and it matters little whether a few more unhistorical statements are or are not appended, whether by the same or by another hand. Nor must it be forgotten that our task was virtually ended when we found that the accounts given of the resurrection were thoroughly irreconcileable, and that in such tales as that of the Sanhedrim and the guard we hav to deal with transparent fictions. If we hav no evidence whatever for the carnal or physical resurrection there described, it is manifestly a work of supererogation to examin accounts which describe appearances after that event. This superfluous task we hav undertaken, and the result is only to show that the later stories are as shadowy and self contradictory as any that hav preceded them" (Thomas Scott's English Life of Jesus, pages 326 and 327).

What, then, are the conclusions to which the rational mind is irresistibly driven in reference to the alleged resurrection and ascension?

1. That the resurrection is not a historical fact.

2. That the alleged miracle is not properly attested.

3. That the supposed witnesses were really not witnesses at all, since they do not profess to hav seen the resurrection take place, and merely record the traditional belief respecting it.

4. That the records we hav cannot be shown to hav been in existence earlier than the middle of the second century.

Now, I hav sought to demonstrate in a previous chapter that Christianity grew out of sun-worship and nature-worship, and I hav no doubt whatever that the myths of the resurrection and ascension are taken from ancient Egyptian mythology. Indeed, Gerald Massey, the poet and scholar, maintains in his great work, "The Natural Genesis," that the real historical Jesus—Jehoshua Ben-Pandira—was born in Egypt at least one hundred and eighty years before the alleged birth of Christ of the New Testament.

"The Jews," says Gerald Massey, "do not identify Jehoshua Ben-Pandira with the gospel Jesus, of whom they, his supposed contemporaries, know nothing, but protest against the assumption as an impossibility; whereas the Christians do identify their Jesus as the descendant of Pandira. It was he or nobody; yet he was neither the son of Joseph nor the Virgin Mary, nor was he crucified at Jerusalem. It is not the Jews, then, but the Christians, who fuse two supposed historical characters into one. There being but one history acknowledged or known on either side, it follows that the Jesus of the gospels is the Jehoshua of the Talmud, or is not at all as a person. This shifts the basis altogether; it antedates the human history by more than a hundred years, and it at once destroys the historic character of the gospels, together with that of any other personal Jesus than Ben-Pandira. In fact, the Jewish history of the matter will be found to corroborate the mythical" (The Historical Jesus and the Mythical Christ, by Gerald Massey, page 4).

How has the mythical character or the Jesus of the gospels been built up? Let Gerald Massey, who is a master of the subject, speak again: "The mythical messiah was always born of a virgin mother—a factor unknown in natural phenomena, and one that cannot be historical, one that can only be explained by means of the mythos and those conditions of primitiv sociology which are mirrored in mythology and preserved in theology. The virgin mother has been represented in Egypt by the maiden queen, Mut-em-na, the future mother of Amenhepi III., some sixteen centuries B.C., who impersonated the eternal virgin that produced the eternal child. Four consecutiv scenes reproduced in my book ('The Natural Genesis') are found portrayed upon the innermost walls of the Holy of Holies in the Temple of Luxor, which was built by Amenhepi III., a Pharaoh of the seventeenth dynasty. The first scene on the left hand shows the god Taht, the lunar Mercury, the annunciator of the gods, in the act of healing the virgin queen and announcing to her that she is to giv birth to the coming son. In the next scene the god Knepi (in conjunction with Hathor) givs the new life. This is the Holy Ghost, or spirit, that causes the Immaculate Conception, Knepi being the spirit by name in Egyptian. The natural effects are made apparent in the virgin's swelling form. Next the mother is seated on the midwife's stool, and the new-born child is supported in the hands of one of the nurses. The fourth scene is that of the adoration. Here the child is enthroned, receiving homage from the gods and gifts from men. Behind the deity Knepi on the right, three spirits—the three magi, or kings of the legend—are kneeling and offering presents with their right hand and life with their left. The child thus announced, incarnated, born, and worshiped was the Pharaonic representativ of the Aten sun in Egypt, the god Adon of Syria, and Hebrew Adonai; the child-Christ of the Aten Cult; the miraculous conception of the ever virgin mother, personated by Mut-em-na, as mother of the 'only one,' and representativ of the divine mother of the youthful sun-god. These scenes, which were mythical in Egypt, hav been copied or reproduced as historical in the canonical gospels, where they stand like four corner-stones to the historic structure, and prove that the foundations are mythical" (Massey, Historical Jesus and Mythical Christ, p. 5). In point of fact, the whole career of Jesus, from his alleged birth to the crucifixion, is based upon Egyptian mythology.

Jesus is said to hav been born of a virgin, and so were many of the mythical pagan gods. In the Egyptian mythology the virgin was also called the harlot (see Massey, Ibid, 5), because she represented the monogamic stage of intercourse; Jesus, moreover, descended from four forms of the harlot—Thamar, Rahab, Ruth, and Bathsheba. Jesus is also said to hav been conceived before all worlds; he is also alleged to hav said, "Before Abraham was I am," and as son of the virgin-mother, of course, it is true that he preceded his father.

The birth of Christ is purely astronomical; and so in my judgment is the crucifixion. The synoptic gospel says that Jesus was crucified on the 15th of the month Nisan. John affirms that it was the 14th of the month. According to Gerald Massey this difference as human history cannot be explained, but proves the mythos, for he says: "The crucifixion (or crossing) was, and still is, determined by the full moon of Easter." This, in the lunar reckoning, would be the 14th of the month of twenty-eight days; in the solar month of thirty days it was reckoned to occur on the 15th of the month. But unite, and the rift closes in proving the crucifixion to hav been astronomical, just as it was in Egypt where the two dates can be identified." And the ascension has an equally mythological bearing.

The mythical Christ is similar to the Horus in the Osirian mythos; the Har Khupi in the Sut-Typhomim; Khunsi in the Amen Ra; and Christ is called the "Good Shepherd;"

So was Horus.

Christ was called "The lamb of God, which taketh away the sins of the world;"

So was Horus.

Christ was "The bread of life;"

So was Horus.

Christ was "The truth of the life;"

So was Horus.

Christ was "The Lord;"

So was Horus.

Christ also bears a great resemblance to Buddha (Gautama).

Christ was born of a virgin named Mary.

Gautama was born of a virgin named Maya.

Christ was baptized by water and afterward by the Holy Spirit.

So was Gautama.

Christ fasted forty days and forty nights.

So did Gautama.

Christ delivered a sermon on the mount.

So did Gautama.

Christ was tempted by the devil.

So was Gautama.

Christ was crucified and on the third day rose again.

So was not Gautama—but so was Kristna, another mythological God.

The whole of the evidence, therefore, leads directly to the conclusion that the Jesus of the gospels is not a historical character at all, but is built out of materials composed largely of Egyptian mythology, which was based upon supposed astronomical phenomena.

English Notes.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKERS: Last Sunday found me again at Manchester, where the weather was dirty, as usual. There must be some good reason why one seldom finds a pretty day in that huge city. Nobody counts on fine weather, and if it come, why, it is a pleasant surprise; that is all. But the work itself in Manchester is right bonny, and the members of the branch are as enthusiastic as anyone could well wish them to be. By the time this letter is in print I hope to hav taken up my residence there for a year or two, with a view to federating the county of Lancashire, where many towns and several branches of the National Secular Society exist. Of course it is not safe to prophesy; yet the thing is so nearly certain that I am now selling off my business here in order to devote myself exclusivly to Freethought organization. There is room for half a dozen men in England. Unfortunately we hav not got beyond the experimental stage yet; and if the scheme collapse, I can still resume commercial life.

Returning to the metropolis by way of Birmingham, I bethought me to call on our mutual friend, Charles Watts. Since his return from America Mr. Watts has settled in Birmingham as Freethought bishop of that city, and a commodious hall with house attached has fallen to his lot. The house was long used as a sort of workmen's club, the result being grievous dilapidation and general dirtiness of the building. Painters, however, hav been set to work upon the premises; and now our old friends are all comfortably domiciled and appear to be very happy amongst the good people of Birmingham. Naturally the conversation turned upon the work in general. Mr. Watts criticised one and another with perfectly good taste, giving the palm to Mr. G. W. Foote, whose lecture on "Who Made the Bible?"—which friend Charles heard the other evening at Deptford—he described as being "simply grand." Perhaps testimony of greater value was that which Mr. Watts gave to the skill and untiring energy with which the president is working for the National Secular Society.

Whilst roaming in the Midlands I made a brief stay at Leicester to see what is being done there. Another veteran and his family were full of information as to the progress of this prosperous society. Mr. Slater is an old lecturer, once well before the public, but who is now of a more retiring frame of mind. He livs with his son on the premises of the Leicester Secular Hall, and alongside of the local Freethought publisher, Mr. Holyoak, whose handsome shop forms part of the Secular premises. Once upon a time Mr. G. J. Holyoake seems to hav had thoughts of settling in this town, though I think he never did so. Leicester is famous in the Freethought world for its excellent hymn-book. Would that more societies used it! For some insufficient reason this society stands aloof from the parent society, sharing its unpleasant isolation with Chatham and Sheffield. If they abstained from National Secular Society lecturers I could understand them better. However, there are always dissentients from every wise purpose, and Leicester shows the way in this deplorable respect.

Fancy getting Secularism preached in a financial paper! Yet that is the latest phase of our "moribund" Secularism. The Weekly Bulletin, which deals principally with stocks and shares, now devotes considerable attention to Atheistic matters, and speaks in no uncertain tones. One writer has given the bishop of London a dressing anent episcopal incomes, although he falls into the not uncommon error of supposing their lordships make a nice little pile by their profession. As a matter of fact, episcopacy is an expensiv luxury wherever the bishop is at all hospitable. Now and again you find a lord mayor who saves something during his year of office; but he has to be very niggardly to do it. The same applies to the bishops. If his lordship is never "at home," and refers his numerous callers to the nearest hotel for their lunch, a bishop may pocket a hundred or two per annum; only I do not know of a bishop to whom that applies, and I incline to think, knowing something about it, that the bishops, in common with many of the subordinate clergy, spend much more on their work than they receive, however large the figures may appear to the uninitiated. None the less it is a sign of the times when such matters are discussed from a Freethought standpoint in so worldly a journal as the Weekly Bulletin.

Whilst writing about the press I might mention two other proofs of Secular vitality, as shown by the anxiety of the clerical party to crush out the general aspiration for release from theological subjection. The first is a twelv-cent pamphlet, tastefully bound, published by the Religious Tract Society. It is called "The Secularist Programme," and is written by the Rev. W. H. Harris, of Victoria Docks, London. In a few "friendly words to the working classes" the reverend gentleman makes a comparison of the Secularist and the Christian views of life. To do him credit, he endeavors to state our case fairly by taking as his text for the various chapters the various clauses of the "principles and objects" of the National Secular Society, printing them in larger and thicker letters than the body of the book. In the course of sixty-four pages he makes his comparison, and I think that the Secularist program proves too strong for the Christian antagonist. Much that he says is good, and useful to ponder over; but the fact remains that, whereas the Freethought position needs no begging of questions, the Christian theories hav to take an unpleasant number of foundation arguments for granted.

The second volume I saw in Eliot Stock's window and hav not seen its contents. "Agnosticism Found Wanting" is its title and one requires a spare dollar to purchase it. Unfortunately, the probability is only too great that there is nothing fresh within its covers, for all these Christian apologists seem to run in the same groove, and to argue against a thing with which they hav no intimate acquaintance. On their own side they condemn the letter and plead for the spirit of scripture; on ours they condemn us remorselessly on the bare letter without even attempting to enter into the spirit of our creed. Very well; each to his taste; but most of us hav had and hav survived a very bad attack of Christianism, and in fighting against it we are fighting against that of which we know much. When our clerical friends hav tried Secularism as long as we tried Christianity, their refutations of our principles will be far more interesting and profitable than they can be under present circumstances.

Just now we are greatly agitated by the school-board elections, and are filled with a longing to get one or more Atheists upon each of the numerous boards now being chosen. Mr. Forder is winning golden opinions from the London press and is almost certain of success. Should he get in we shall hav a practical and businesslike man on the Thames embankment, who not only can but will speak his mind, and from whom we shall expect very, very much. Next week I shall be able to tell you the result.

Items of Foreign News Interesting to Freethinkers.

The pious government of Bavaria seems to be in favor of a bill recently introduced by the Ultramontane (Catholic) party. The bill calls for the erection of chapels on all railroad stations, but the framers of this document forgot to state whether these chapels shall be for the use of everybody, or for Catholics only.

The daily papers of south Sweden are getting to be quite Liberal. Orisundaposten, Ystad's Allehanda and Folkets Tidning in Lund are among those who show themselvs as true newspapers. In a recent number the latter states: "We therefore advise our readers not to neglect this opportunity of becoming acquainted with a teaching which already now numbers millions of adherents in the highest as well as lower classes of society."

The Freethinkers of Sweden are getting aggressiv. It has been resolved that the Freethinkers of a city go in a body to the different churches and there listen to sermons given, taking one church one Sunday, another church another Sunday. Through the daily papers or by bills it will be announced that such or such a society will attend a certain church, and that the worshipers in same, especially the minister, are invited to be present in the afternoon at the society rooms to listen and partake in a discussion of the forenoon sermon.

At the recent Methodist congress, held at Washington, D. C., statistics were produced, says Die Freidenker, which claimed that there were in Ministers.	Church-members.	Believers.

Europe	4,481	315,284	420,960
Asia	538	34 334	115,000
Africa	294	71,000	283,000
Australia	785	93,000	490 000
America	36,601	5,350,494	20,000,000

Hence, in the whole world there are 44,695 Methodist ministers, 6,494,399 persons who hav been fooled, and 25,000,000 who are said to hav been fooled.

We hav on several occasions called the attention of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to the International Committee on Moral Laws, which, under the auspices of the French Freethought Federation, has endeavored to produce a code of secular morals. The committee's work is far from finished, yet it has, thanks to the energy of its president, M. Jean Paul Cés, and the plurality of its members, succeeded in presenting the essential "Principles of Secular Morality and Education." The writer of these items, as corresponding member for the United States, received the other day a volume entitled, "Principes de Morale et d'Education Laïgues," and will, in one of the first numbers of this paper, devote an article to this book, which, in our opinion, is decidedly preferable to the semi-orthodox "Prize Manual."

From the last number of Nordisk Missionstidskrift we gather the following statistics regarding the missionary doings among the heathen. We think this item timely, following as it does the excellent editorial, "Missionaries in China," which appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 28th. Since 1845 the Scandinavian mission business has increased as follows: Number of male missionaries, four times; female missionaries, twenty-six times; nativ priests, nineteen times; nativ helpers, six times; schools, five times; scholars, six times as many; and at present (1890) the number of missionaries of both sexes is 5,878; of nativ ministers, 34,012; of schools, 12,928; of scholars, 683,276. (These figures, except those of the missionaries, must be salted considerably before taken in.) Fully reliable, however, are the following, which denote the amount of money collected to the support of foreign missions:

Year.	Norway.	Denmark.	Sweden.	Finland.
1845	8,470 cr.	2 098 cr.	—— cr.	—— cr.
1859	23 540 "	3 740 "	—— "	7,876 "
1875	154,757 "	26,179 "	90,561 "	34 410 "
1889	441,011 "	106,903 "	261,583 "	63,372 "

While contributions from the whole world amounted in round figures in 1845 to 11,090,000 crowns, in 1859 to 16 600,000, in 1875 to 28,500,000, in 1889 to 40,900,000 crowns.

A Christmas or New Year's Present.

The "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book" in cloth binding ($2.50) is one of the best Christmas or New Year's presents a Liberal can make to a friend. Christmas is a pagan festival and New Year's is only a mark of time, but the Text-Book is a thing of beauty and a joy forever, and will help to rationalize the festival and make your friend forget the flight of years.

Death of Thomas Winter.

From the Cincinnati Inquirer of December 7th.

A notable cremation took place at the Crematory yesterday morning at 11 o'clock.

The deceased was Thomas Winter, who had died Friday at the residence of his son Richard, at 22 Gest street.

The family moved into that house only three weeks ago, and hav had much misfortune since. Two weeks ago Richard's wife died, and he himself is now confined to his bed with sickness which prevented him attending his father's funeral yesterday. The cremation was the one hundred and forty-ninth at the institution, and was under the auspices of the Ohio Liberal League, an organization of some seventy-five members, which was formed only one week ago. There was a very large attendance of friends and relativs of the deceased. Many attested their affection by bestowing a last farewell kiss ere the body was committed to the flames. Services were held in the Crematory chapel, but they were wholly of a secular nature. There were no prayers, and nothing that was at all religious. An eloquent oration was delivered by a prominent Freethinker, in which he gave a sketch of Mr. Winter's long life, and paid a glowing tribute to his many virtues and amiable qualities. Thomas Winter was nearly ninety-one years of age, having been born in Bath, England, June 20, 1801. He has resided in Cincinnati over half a century. He was a hatter by trade, and for over thirty years kept a hat-repairing shop on Eighth street, near Central avenue, and he was a familiar figure in that locality. The people around got accustomed to seeing the little old man with a long white beard and his back bent with age.

During the past two years he had his shop at 407 West Seventh street. He had been identified with Atheism and Materialism for the last seventy-five years, and was one of the oldest Materialists in America. He has written for philosophical and Liberal papers for the last five years and was an activ Abolitionist at the time of the war, having labored beside such persons as Parker Pillsbury, William Lloyd Garrison, Lucy B. Colman, and others of similar role. He was a wealthy man at one time and owned considerable property on Sixth street, but lost most of his money in the fifties, during the financial panics and bank failures. He was a man who never used tobacco or alcoholic liquors in any form and many of his friends attribute his longevity to his abstemious habits.

He had been confined to his bed for over a week on account of weakness due to old age, and last Thursday he had a presentiment that he was going to die. He thereupon sent a communication to the Ohio Liberal League requesting to be cremated under the auspices of the League. Another request which he made a little before his death was a singular one. He wanted to be cremated in his old English suit which he had brought to this country over fifty years ago. It was a broadcloth suit, lined with doeskin, and was very old fashioned. In accordance with his request, he was attired in this suit after his death. The pall-bearers were Mr. Geo. E. Light, President of the Eureka Heating and Ventilating Company, Samuel Silberman, Andrew Hogg, and Ralph Taylor, all officers of the Ohio Liberal League.

News and Notes.

The last lecture in the course at San Diego was given on Sunday evening, November 29th. A fine musical program was presented, which added greatly to the interest of the occasion. Mrs. L. Reicherbaugh, assisted by Mr. Fred Baker with the violin, evoked from the piano its most brilliant strains. Mrs. G. H. Schmidt and Mr. Frank Schmidt received applause for their beautiful solos, and then a charming duet was given by Miss Stella Case and Miss Mabel Johnson. This made a delightful introduction to the more solid matter of the lecture, which was upon "Evolution and Creation." I hav not found anywhere a more generous welcome than in San Diego. It seems as if the superb climate itself was conduciv to Liberal ideas. One cannot believe much in hell-fire in so lovely a world. It has been like a summer's day ever since I arrived. While I read of storms in the East, cyclones and snows, here is the balmy air, here is the blue sky, here are the gems of mountains softly glittering in silver and in gold—here are the fruits and flowers still glowing beneath Apollo's smiles, here is the broad, bright sea, the shining beach, the waves ever singing, leaping, and flashing in merry music and dancing foam—the ocean far away with gorgeous islands towering in the mellow distance. They say that this is really the site of the Garden of Eden, that here are the rivers that run underground, that here is the apple that any woman would eat if she had a chance. Whether it was that garden of the olden time, it certainly is to be an Eden in the future, and for the sick and weary there are certainly no more exhilarating surroundings.

I shall always return to San Diego with good heart. I am sorry that I did not hav a longer time to visit with friends; but during the week-days I was busy in the vicinity. I did not even hav a chance to visit Coronado Beach and the magnificent hotel. I meant to hav called upon my Liberal friends, Dr. and Mrs. L. B. Comings, who are located on the beach. I was pleased to meet, after many years, my artist friend, Mr. F. E. Sturgis, with whom I formerly had a rather tough campaign in Ohio, on the picket line where there were but few to help. We both survived and renew our comradeship upon these sunny shores. Mr. Sturgis thinks he will find new health and new hope in this land, which is now his home. A college classmate I also greet here—Mr. Benjamin McLeran and his family, and I find that from the orthodox shades of Dartmouth he has traveled like myself into the sunlight of Liberal faith. It was a pleasure also to meet Mrs. Susan M. Brady, who is always ready to aid the "forlorn hope." Her generous contributions to the cause are well known by our workers in the field. I shall not forget the pleasant, hospitable table of Mr. and Mrs. James Bidwell, nor our friends Mr. and Mrs. W. E. Rowe, Mr. and Mrs. Ranford Worthing, Mr. and Mrs. F. F. Wright, and many others. I shall not forget the genial Theosophical circle, nor the fellowship of the Liberal Spiritualist, nor the cultured Unitarian, who is not afraid of the Infidel. San Diego has a fine literary spirit pervading its society. I shall not forget the New Carleton Hotel, with its genial proprietors Mr. and Mrs. W. A. Dorris. Here with the good things of this world and elegant entertainment, is a kind of Liberal center. Freethinkers seem to come here by a natural affinity, and form an attractiv circle.

Thus San Diego is a camping-ground where the fires blaze brightly and we feel that we are not upon the picket line, but in the grand army, with music and banners floating and comrades marching on.

Early Monday morning I speed away. I lecture at Los Angeles Monday evening. I hav the pleasure of taking dinner with Mr. and Mrs. Bruce, and getting acquainted with their splendid little baby, whose name is Robert Ingersoll. I meet John Riggin, still bright and cheerful, with renewed health. J. E. Clark is also at the post. I meet C. Severance, our valiant comrade, Col. J. M. Voss, the Schroeders, Will H. Baker, and others.

Frank C. Young and J. A. Hill are enrolled in Truth Seeker ranks. A fair audience is present at New Opera Hall. A good six months' campaign is what is required at Los Angeles. There are many Liberals here, but it takes time to bring them into action. I think I shall arrange to be here for at least a month after the state convention. Those whom I did meet at this present time are earnest and enthusiastic for the advance of the cause. The Assembly of Progress still maintains its ground, is increasing in membership, and promises to be a valuable aid in Freethought comradeship.

I am obliged to leave Los Angeles Monday night and push on for Tulare City, where I lecture Tuesday evening. I find improvement here. The Liberal guard is gaining. R. G. Parker is the veteran of our forces, and there are with him William Manske, A. G. Woodward, L. McKay, G. W. Forbes, Mr. Dewey, formerly of the Valley Enterprise, J. T. Axley, and others. It happened that the Farmers' Alliance appointed a lecturer for the same night. As we had secured the hall it was arranged that he should speak from 7 to 8, and after that I would lecture. Mr. Redstone and Mr. Clapp were the speakers of the Alliance. The program was carried out and it proved to be a happy hit. Mr. Clapp is a pretty live speaker, and at the close of my lecture I gave him an opportunity to discuss my points. He did so, and we had a rattling debate for about an hour, and the audience seemed to be quite impartial in their applause. I didn't know exactly how to locate my critic. By the way he pitched into Constantine I knew he was not an Episcopalian or papist. He condemned Sam Jones and I knew he was no Methodist. I was assured that he was some kind of a heretic. He didn't take an orthodox view of the Bible by any means. He said he didn't want Christianity with any devil in it. He seemed to be a Deist somewhat after the manner of Thomas Paine, and yet withal a kind of a Christian believer. I finally found out that he was a Mormon elder. Now, Mormonism is such a mixed-up affair—a mingling of Spiritualism, Universalism, Unitarianism, Rationalism—that it is pretty difficult to know how to take it; for half the time it is on your own side. It was, as McKay says, like the Frenchman who tried to fight an Irishman, both armed with swords. The Frenchman fought with the usual rules of fencing, but the Irishman, not knowing the rules of fencing, used his sword as he would a shillala, and that was a puzzler to the swordsman. It was the first time he had ever experienced that method of warfare. This was the first time I had struck a Mormon elder in debate, and he was so heterodox that it was pretty puzzling to know just where to hit. It was impossible after all to more than skirmish in the short time we had, and I challenged the elder to a week's debate. He accepted the challenge, but as he is busy now in the county as the lecturer of the Farmers' Alliance, and I hav about three months' work ahead, the time for such debate cannot be arranged. I shall be ready for it, though, if it takes all summer. I would really like to debate with a Mormon elder. It would be a new sensation. It would be like catching eels—the sport would be exciting. A Mormon is not so easily handled as the orthodox Christian. He does not believe in hell fire or a vicarious atonement. He does not accept the Bible as an infallible revelation, but as a book of records; the history of a revelation, but not the revelation itself, as the orthodox hold. I hope the debate will come off. It will giv a chance to elucidate many things concerning which the public is very ignorant. The Mormons are not fools, not near so big fools as the orthodox, at any rate in theology.

The campaign at Tulare went off in good shape, and the way is open for something better in the future. Anything for agitation to make the people realize that there is something new and different.

I leave Tulare Wednesday morning for Hanford, where I lecture Wednesday evening. I find that Hanford is a growing place. There hav been two big fires since I was here two years ago, but handsome buildings are taking the place of the ruins. The country about Hanford is excellent—one of the best in the state—and Hanford is in the way of permanent prosperity. The Liberal element is somewhat scattered, but on the whole I find a fair field. We are disappointed in regard to the hall—the one originally secured being rented to other parties by mistake. The Methodist church having been "sold out" it was hired for the occasion of the purchasers, but when the Methodists found out what was to be done they immediately arranged matters so that the Infidel would be left out. Not until I arrived was a hall secured—Biddle's Hall. This gave but little time for advertising. A larger number were present than I expected. It was a most appreciativ audience. The subject of the lecture was "Evolution and Creation." H. C. Tandy is our main support here. He is not afraid to stand in the front rank. I found a welcome at the hospitable table of Dr. and Mrs. Mickle. Some of the friends I met before are located in other places. The Liberal element, however, is pretty strong, if only there is an opportunity for expression. Under more favorable circumstances I am sure of a large audience at this place.

Thursday I come on to Lemoore, where I always hav a cordial welcome, and I like to visit here. I lecture here two nights, Thursday and Friday. I lectured last night, Thursday, to a full house. I was introduced by Mr. Cunningham, now member of the legislature. I lectured on the "Evolutions of a Century—Religious and Theological," and to-night I lecture on "Spiritualism, Theosophy, and Infidelity." To day I am writing these notes; to-morrow early I leave for Oakdale, where I lecture Saturday and Sunday. I guess I hav written enough for this week, which has been quite a lively one, and I will tell my story of Lemoore next week. I am at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Fox—Mr. Joel A. Fox, a veteran of the antislavery cause and a lifelong Infidel, now seventy-three years of age, Mrs. Sarah G. Fox, his wife, a contributor now and then to The Truth Seeker. Mr. Frank B. Fox, their son, has married since I was here, and I congratulate him on his good sense and taste. I enjoy myself in this delightful home. I can read books and papers to my heart's content, and write these notes while the wind blows its stormy music, and the sunshine glints on the mountainous clouds and the green earth and bending trees. It is like an Indian summer to-day. There was rain last night, and the scenery presents a fresh and splendid aspect. Amid such surroundings of nature and humanity it is easy to believe in the "good time coming."

Arbitration Instead of War.

Mr. Frank B. Carpenter's picture, "International Arbitration," has been presented to the queen of England, and will reach Windsor Castle before Christmas. At a dinner given the artist recently, at which the picture was unveiled, the conversation turned upon the event. Among the famous men present were Colonel Ingersoll, Robert Collyer, Andrew D. White, and many others prominent in law, literature, and art. Colonel Ingersoll's speech was upon Art. He said:

I presume I take about as much interest in what that picture represents as anybody else. I believe that it has been said this evening that the world will never be civilized as long as differences between nations are settled by gun or cannon or sword. Barbarians still settle their personal differences with clubs or arms, and finally, when they leave their differences to their peers, to a court, we call them civilized. Now, nations sustain the same relations to each other that barbarians sustain; that is, they settle their differences by force; each nation being the judge of the righteousness of its cause, and its judgment depending entirely—or for the most part—on its strength; and the strongest nation is the nearest right. Now, until nations submit their differences to an international court—a court with the power to carry its judgments into effect by having the armies and navies of all the rest of the world pledged to support it—the world will not be civilized. Our differences will not be settled by arbitration until more of the great nations set the example, and until that is done I am in favor of the United States being armed. Until that is done it will giv me joy to know that another man-of-war has been launched upon our waters. And I will tell you why.

GENERAL GRANT.

Look again at that picture. There is another face; it is not painted there, and yet without it that picture would not hav been painted, and that is the face of U. S. Grant. The oliv branch, to be of any force, must be offered by the mailed hand. It must be offered by a nation which has back of the oliv branch the force. It cannot be offered by weakness, because then it will excite only ridicule. The power, the imperial, must offer the branch. Then it will be accepted in the true spirit; otherwise not. So until the world is a little more civilized I am in favor of the largest guns that can be made and the best navy that floats. I do not want any navy unless we do hav the best, because if you hav a poor one you will simply make a present of it to the enemy as soon as the war opens. We should be ready to defend ourselvs against the world. Not that I think there is going to be any war, but because I think that is the best way to prevent it. Until the whole world shall hav entered into the same spirit as the artist when he painted that picture, until that spirit becomes general we hav got to be prepared for war. And we cannot depend upon war suasion. If a fleet of men-of-war should sail into our harbor, talk would not be any good; we must be ready to answer them in their own way.

Another proposition has been put forth this evening that the world would be made good by doing away with the tariff. Well, I am in favor of doing away with the tariff on everything that we want; things that we don't want I would not allow to come in at any price. So I substantially agree with Henry George. I do not believe in raising revenue in that way. Everything we should make we should make; everything we cannot make we should buy as cheaply as it can be sold. And I am also in favor of protection, as they call it, but only for one thing; not for the money, but for the purpose of diffusing and advancing the industries of this country to the end that we may use all the brain we hav; that we may make bigger men and women. Any nation that sells its raw material will remain poor and miserable, and any nation that manufactures it will grow intelligent and rich.

INGERSOLL ON ART.

Now, having shown that a tax is not necessary, I will come to the question, and I suppose I hav been selected to speak on art because I can speak on that subject without prejudice, knowing nothing about it. I hav on this subject no hobbies, no pet theories, and consequently will giv you not what I know, but what I think. I am an Agnostic in many things, and the way I understand art is this: In the first place, we are all invisible to each other. There is something called soul; something that thinks and hopes and loves. It is never seen. It occupies a world that we call the brain, and is forever, so far as we know, invisible. Each soul livs in a world of its own, and it endeavors to communicate with another soul living in a world of its own, each invisible to the other, and it does this in a variety of ways. That is the noblest art which expresses the noblest thought, that givs to another the noblest emotions that this unseen soul had. In order to do this we hav to seize upon the seen, the visible. In other words, nature is a vast dictionary that we use simply to convey from one invisible world to another what happens in our invisible world. The man that livs in the greatest world and succeeds in letting other worlds know what happens in other worlds, is the greatest artist.

I believe that all arts hav the same father and the same mother, and no matter whether you express what happens in these unseen worlds in mere words —because nearly all pictures hav been made with words—or whether you express it in marble or form and color in what we call painting, it is to carry on that commerce between these invisible worlds, and he is the greatest artist who expresses the tenderest, noblest thought to the unseen worlds about him. So that all art consists in this commerce, every soul being an artist and every brain that is worth talking about being an art gallery, and there is no gallery in this world, not in the Vatican or the Louvre or any other place, comparable with the gallery in every great brain. The millions of pictures that are in every brain to-night! The landscapes, the faces, the groups, the millions of millions of millions of things that are now living here in every brain, all unseen, all unseen, all invisible forever. Yet we communicate with each other by showing each other these pictures, these studies, and by inviting others into our galleries and showing them what we hav, and greatest artist is he who has the most pictures to show to other artists.

WHAT IS BEAUTIFUL?

I love anything in art that suggests the tender, the beautiful. What is beautiful? Of course there is no absolutely beautiful. All beauty is relativ. Probably the most beautiful thing to a frog is the speckled belly of another frog, or to a snake the markings of another snake. So there is no such thing as absolute beauty. But what I call beauty is what suggests to me the highest and the tenderest thought; something that answers to something that is in my world. So every work of art has to be born in some brain, and it must be made by the unseen artist we call the soul. Now if a man simply copies what he sees he is nothing but a copyist. That does not require genius. That requires industry and the habit of observation. But it is not genius; it is not art. Those little daubs and shreds and patches we get by copying are pieces of iron that need to be put into the flame of genius to be molten and then cast in noble forms; otherwise there is no genius.

The great picture should hav not only the technical part of art, which is neither moral nor immoral, but in addition some great thought, some great event. It should contain not only a history but a prophecy. There should be in it soul, feeling, thought. I love those little pictures of the home, of the fireside, of the old lady boiling the kettle, the vine running over the cottage door, scenes suggesting to me happiness, contentment. I think more of them than of the great war-pieces, and I hope I shall hav a few years in some such scenes, during which I won't care what time it is nor what day of the week or month it is. Just that feeling of content when it is enough to liv, to breathe, to hav the blue sky above you, and to hear the music of the water. All art which givs us that content, that delight, enriches this world and makes life better and holier.

That, in a general kind of way, as I said before, is my idea of art, and I hope that the artists of America—and they ought to be as good here as in any place on earth—will grow day by day and year by year independent of all other art in the world, and be true to the American or republican spirit always. As to this picture, it is representativ, it is American. There is one word Mr. Dougherty said to which I would like to refer. I hav never said very much in my life in defense of England, at the same time I hav never blamed England for being against us during our war, and I will tell you why. We had been a nation of hypocrits. We pretended to be in favor of liberty and yet we had four or five millions of our people enslaved. That was a very awkward position. We had bloodhounds to hunt human beings and the apostles setting them on; and while this was going on these poor wretches, lighted by the Northern star, sought and found liberty on British soil. Now why not be honest about it? We were rather a contemptible people, though Mr. Dougherty thinks the English were wholly at fault. But England abolished the slave trade in 1803; she abolished slavery in her colonies in 1833. We were lagging behind. That is all there is about it. No matter why, we put ourselvs in that position of pretending to be a free people while we had millions of slaves, and it was only natural that England should dislike it.

THE WICKED CONSTITUTION.

I think the chairman said that there had been no great historic picture of the signing of the Constitution. There never should be, never! It was fit, it was proper to hav a picture of the signing of the Declaration of Independence. That was an honest document. Our people wanted to giv a good reason for fighting Great Britain, and in order to do that they had to dig down to the bed-rock of human rights, and then they said all men are created equal. But just as soon as we got our independence we made a Constitution that gave the lie to the Declaration of Independence, and that is why the signing of the Constitution never ought to be painted. We put in that Constitution a clause that the slave trade should not be interfered with for years, and another clause that this entire government was pledged to hand back to slavery any poor woman with a child at her breast, seeking freedom by flight. It was a very poor document. A little while ago they celebrated the one-hundredth anniversary of that business and talked about the Constitution being such a wonderful thing; yet what was in that Constitution brought on the most terrific civil war ever known, and during that war they said, "Giv us the Constitution as it is and the Union as it was." And I said then, "Curse the Constitution as it is and the Union as it was. Don't talk to me about fighting for a Constitution that has brought on a war like this; let us make a new one." No, I am in favor of a painting that would celebrate the adoption of the amendment to the Constitution that declares that there shall be no more slavery on this soil.

GETTING FREER EVERY DAY

I believe we are getting a little more free every day—a little more sensible all the time. A few years ago a woman in Germany made a speech, in which she asked: "Why should the German mother in pain and agony giv birth to a child and rear that child through industry and poverty, and teach him that when he arrives at the age of twenty-one it will be his duty to kill the child of the French mother? And why should the French mother teach her son that it will be his duty some time to kill the child of the German mother?" There is more sense in that than in all the diplomacy I ever read, and I think the time is coming when that question will be asked by every mother—why she should raise a child to kill the child of another mother. The time is coming when we shall do away with all this. A man has been taught that he ought to fight for the country where he was born; no matter about that country being wrong, whether it supported him or not, whether it enslaved him and trampled on every right he had, still it was his duty to march up in support of that wretched country. The time will come when the man will make up his mind himself whether the country is worth while fighting for, and he is the greatest patriot who seeks to make his country worth fighting for, and not he who says I am for it anyhow, whether it is right or not. These patriots will be the force Mr. George was speaking about. If war between this country and Great Britain was declared, and there were men in both countries sufficient to take a right view of it, that would be the end of war. The thing would be settled by arbitration—settled by some court—and no one would dream of rushing to the field of battle. So that is my hope for the world; more policy, more good, solid, sound sense, and less mud patriotism.

I think this country is going to grow. I think it will take in Mr. Wiman's country, and I think there is only one air enough in this country to float one flag. I do not mean that we are going to take any country. I mean that they are going to come to us. I do not believe in conquest. Canada will come just as soon as it is to her interest to come, and I think she will come, or be a great country to herself. I do not believe in these people, intelligent as they are, sending three thousand miles for information they hav at home. I do not believe in their being governed by anybody except themselvs. So if they come we will be glad to hav them; if they don't want to come I do not want them.

WE ARE GROWING.

Yes, we are growing. I do not know how many millions of people we hav now, probably over sixty-two if they all get counted. And they are still coming. I expect to liv to see one hundred million there. I know that some say that we are getting too many foreigners, but I say that the more come the better. We hav got to hav somebody to take the places of the sons of our rich people. So I say let them come. There is plenty of land here, everywhere. The territory now drained by the Mississippi, nature's protest against secession, can support five hundred million. Just the valley of the Mississippi. Yet we hav but sixty-two or sixty-three million, and you say we hav enough. I say to the people of every country, come, do your work here, and we will protect you against other countries. We will giv you all the work to supply yourselvs and your neighbors. Then if we hav differences with another country we shall hav a strong navy, big ships, big guns, magnificent men and plenty of them, and if we put out the hand of fellowship and friendship they will know that there is no foolishness about it. They will know that we are not asking any favor. We just say: We want peace, and we tell you over the glistening leaves of this oliv branch that if you do not compromise we will mop the earth with you.

That is the sort of arbitration I believe in, and it is the only sort in my judgment that will be effectual for all time. And I hope that we may still grow, and grow more and more artistic, and more and more in favor of peace, and I pray that we may finally arrive at being absolutely worthy of having presented that picture with all that it implies to the most warlike nation in the world—to the nation that first sends the gospel and then the musket immediately after, and says: "You hav got to be civilized, and the only evidence of civilization that you can giv is to buy our goods and to buy them now, and to pay for them." I wish us to be worthy of the picture presented to such a nation, and my other prayer is—

COLONEL INGERSOLL'S PRAYERS.

Mr. Dougherty (interrupting): What! You pray?

Colonel Ingersoll: Yes, sir; I pray, too, just the the same as you do. You know there was a minister who once rebuked a man for swearing, and the man replied: "Oh, that's all right. I swear and you pray, but neither of us mean anything." And now I will go on to my second prayer. First, I pray that America may be worthy to hav sent such a token in such a spirit, and my second prayer is that England may be worthy to receive it and to keep it, and that she may receive it in the same spirit that it is sent.

I am glad that it is to be sent by a woman. The gentleman who spoke to the toast, "Woman as a Peacemaker," seemed to believe that woman brought all the sorrows that ever happened, not only of war, but troubles of every description. I want to say to him that I would rather liv with the woman I love in a world of war, in a world full of troubles and sorrows, than to liv in heaven with nobody but men. I believe that woman is a peacemaker, and so I am glad that a woman presents this token to another woman. And woman is a far higher title than queen in my judgment; far higher. There are no higher titles than woman, mother, wife, sister, and when they come to calling them countesses, and duchesses, and queens, that is all rot. That adds nothing to the unseen artist who inhabits the world called the brain. That unseen artist is great by nature and cannot be made greater by the addition of titles. And so one woman givs to another woman the picture that prophesies war is finally to cease, and the civilized nations of the world will henceforth arbitrate their differences and no longer strew the plain with corpses of brethren. That is the supreme lesson that is taught by this picture, and I congratulate Mr. Carpenter that his name is associated with it and also with the "Proclamation of Emancipation." In the latter work he has associated his name with that of Lincoln, which is the greatest name in history and the gentlest memory in the world. Mr. Carpenter has associated his name with that and with this and with that of General Grant, for I say that this picture would never hav been possible had there not been behind it Grant; if there had not been behind it the victorious armies of the North and the great armies of the South, that would hav united instantly to hav repelled any foreign foe.

Lectures and Meetings.

W. S. Bell will lecture at San Antonio, Tex., December 20th; El Paso, Tex., 23d, 24th, 25th; Phœnix, Ariz., 27th, 28th, 29th; San Pasquale, Cal., January 2d, 3d.

The Pittsburgh Secular Society meets every Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock in Curry University Hall. Sixth street near Pennsylvania avenue, Pittsburgh, Pa. Seats free and everybody welcome.

John R. Charlesworth's present lecture appointments are as follows: December 21st, 22d, Lexington; 23d, 24th, Strasburg; 27th, 28th, Centralia; 30th, 31st, Waterloo, Ind., January 10th, Columbus, O; 11th, 12th, Shreve; 24th, Kent; 27th, 28th, Farmdale; 29th, Pittsburgh, Pa.

Mr. Putnam will lecture the first four Sundays of January in San Francisco on "The Evolutions of a Century." Subject of first lecture, "Evolutions—Theological and Religious;" of second lecture, "Liberalism, Spiritualism, and Infidelity;" of third lecture, "Industrial Evolutions;" of fourth lecture, "Political Evolutions." January 29th there will be a grand Paine celebration at Union Square Hall. On the following Saturday and Sunday, January 30th and 31st, will be held the state convention.

The Escondido, Cal., Times says: "Samuel P. Putnam the Freethought expounder, lectured at Cravath Hall on Wednesday and Friday evenings of last week, and created considerable interest. The attendance was good both evenings, and a number of citizens fired questions at, and debated with, the speaker. Mr. Putnam has the reputation of being one of the best debaters in the country, and our judgment is that said reputation is well earned." The joy that his advent into that part of the country created is thus described: "B. B. Rockwood was over from San Pasqual Monday, shaking hands with his large circle of friends, and said he never had so much fun, or felt better in his life, than for the past two weeks. Mr. Putnam's visit and lectures had been for him a very feast of reason and freethought, and which accounts for his jubilant spirits."

Hav Men Souls?

Some years ago, shortly before the great blizzard of 1888, I wrote an article for THE TRUTH SEEKER under the above heading. I remember it as being in my own judgment the most unsatisfactory article that ever proceeded from my pen. It left the question unanswered. It arrived at no conclusion except that that question was, so far as I could discover, unanswerable. I hav no copy of it by me, but to the best of my remembrance it ended by leaving the subject in the same condition of uncertainty in which it found it.

A few days after it appeared I left New York. The uncertainty of my whereabouts from week to week, and even from day to day, rendered it impossible for TRUTH SEEKERS to reach me. Some time afterward I was informed, whether truly or not I cannot say, that there had been a considerable amount of discussion in the columns of this paper concerning the matter. I had known nothing of it, and had therefore been unable to take part in it at the time. But now that I am invited to reflect some of the light I hav since received I gladly respond to the call, and will endeavor to tell those who may feel interested in my change of views, and whom I can reach in this manner, whether men hav souls.

What do we mean by souls? Do we mean immaterial substances (whatever they may be) which each individual may imagin he possesses, which hav separate individualities, distinct from any material embodiment, which can continue to exist as separate individualities, freed from all connection with matter, which can think without brains, play upon harps without fingers, sing alleluiahs without voices, wear golden crowns without heads, and clothe themselvs in blood-washed garments without bodies? Hav men such souls as these? My answer in the new light as in the old, is no!

But is there in the universe one infinit soul, the cause of life in all the living, the source of thought in all the thinking, the power of strength in all the working, the harmony of will in all the loving? Is there one omnipotent principle acting throughout nature, more or less imperfectly according to the character of the various organisms through which it acts, ever raising up the present is to a higher to be? Has each man, each beast, each bird, each insect, each flower, each blade of grass, his or its own share of this principle, without which it could never hav been? When its present material environment has been thrown off, has it still another material environment in which its individuality is preserved? To this, the question for which I had no reply before, I answer in the new light—yes!

Now I hear a chorus of voices exclaim, "How do you know?" I will endeavor to inform you how I know, although the fact of my knowing will not help you to know, unless you obtain like evidence for yourselvs. You will not, and ought not to, believe on my authority. Creeds and dogmas are my old enemies with whom I will make no peace, neither in this world nor in the world to come. The only possible proof of spirit existence after this life is in spirit return. He who has had personal evidence of this, indisputable, beyond all possibility of delusion or deceit, knows it. He who has not had this personal evidence, whatever he may believe or disbelieve, knows nothing about it.

I hav already given in the columns of the Better Way a relation of the chief incidents which occurred to me convincing me of the fact that those whom I had known, or of whose existence I had known, on earth, still lived. Many readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER may hav seen it, and it is unnecessary to repeat it in detail. I will mention very briefly some few of these incidents which will serve to explain my change of position. A few months ago no one in America, perhaps no one in the world now living, except myself, was aware of the fact that before I was born a brother of mine was drowned. I very much doubt if it had been present to my own mind within the last forty years. When a medium, in a strange town, and whom I had never met before, sent for me, told me of this, and when I through her received a message from my departed brother, correctly explaining a matter concerning which I was in doubt, I could not disguise from myself the fact that this was a real communication from an unseen intelligence. If not from my brother, from some other spiritual being who was acquainted with the facts and personated him. In either case spirit existence was equally well proved. When through the same medium I received such a history of the earlier portions of my life as I could scarcely hav written from my own unaided memory, including names, and some very unusual and foreign-sounding ones, of people I had met at various times and in different countries, with almost the entire list of my own relatives, I was compelled to admit that the information came from other sources than the brain of the medium or of any living person with whom she could hav had conversation. When I travel to other towns, and other facts known to no one but myself are told me through other mediums, who are for the most part members of private families, not exercising their mediumistic powers publicly, I know that the information comes from spirit sources. These are not instances of mind-reading, for the circumstances alluded to are never in my mind at the time. The best mind-readers require physical contact, or at least a connecting wire, with the thinker, and can read only the thoughts then present in the brain. Their power is within themselvs, something on which they can on all ordinary occasions more or less rely. Between these mediums and myself there is seldom any close proximity, and never can they giv anything beyond what is given to them.

Even in this very brief summary of some of my recent experiences I think I hav given sufficient reasons for acknowledging the truth of spirit existence and spirit return. The evidence I hav personally received directly from spirits I say nothing of, because, good proof as it is to me, it can be none to others. But to the old question, "Hav men souls?" it enables me to reply that each man has his own share of the one universal soul, and when his physical body is worn out or destroyed he will still hav a spirit body in which his individuality will be preserved, and in which he will continue to exist as he does now, but under better and ever-improving conditions.

When a man realizes that he knows nothing there is a chance of his learning something. If he dogmatically asserts that nothing can be known, he is making a creed for himself which will bind and fetter his intellect as much as church-made creeds bind and fetter the intellects of orthodox believers. It is important to know the actual value of our own possessions. It is worth while ascertaining, if we can, whether our lives are to last for a few short years only or whether they are to continue for ever. Therefore the subject is worth investigating fairly. It is some encouragement to struggle on in this world if we are assured that our intellectual and moral developments will be the starting-point of our future existence. It is some consolation to reflect that the knowledge and experience we gain here will not be lost, but will be the foundation on which our future conditions will be erected. He must be strangely infatuated with his life here who is not desirous to know whether or not he has another. Or, on the other hand, he must be extremely dissatisfied with life altogether who is not willing to continue it with the advantage of all the experience he has already gained.

The Spiritualist does not expect another life such as the orthodox promis, but he knows that this life goes right on, with the same desires, interests, and pursuits that it has here, gradually becoming more and more elevated with his ever-increasing knowledge. This is surely not unreasonable. The skeptic is usually too easily disgusted if in the commencement of his investigations he meets with unsatisfactory results. He is too apt to regard the physical evidences as the whole of Spiritualism. If he detects deception in one or two instances he is likely to conclude that all are frauds. The physical evidences may be strong proof if they are above suspicion, but they are valueless except under strictly test conditions, and as a rule no one is so anxious to submit them to the most rigid scrutiny as he who has most belief in the philosophy of Spiritualism.

My Lecture Trip.

Upon leaving Industry for Doniphan, the journey of eighteen miles in that open mailcart, behind those little Mexican broncos, had again to be undertaken; a drizzling rain fell during the ride, which, perhaps, had the effect of dampening the spirits of our team, for, although I had to be left in charge of them again, we reached Clay Center without any adventure to liven the monotony of the journey.

Kansas is not only noted as a Prohibition state, the home of new and somewhat short-lived political parties, but I believe it is also well known by traveling men as affording the most wretched train service in the Union; owing to the latter inconvenience it took me two days to cover about one hundred and forty miles, consequently I did not reach my destination until Monday morning, although I left Industry on the Friday previous. When I arrived at Doniphan fresh difficulties beset me. The town was situated at a distance of two and a half miles from the railroad, and there being no hack service I had to take "that other alternativ" this time and walk. It is not very pleasant traveling under such circumstances as I had to contend with, for snow lay on the ground to a depth of eight inches, and in many places it had drifted more than knee-deep, which was indeed progress under difficulties. An hour's struggle through mud and snow brought me to the little town, better, perhaps, in health than temper, but a few hours before a warm stove, and a regaling of the inner man, soon restored my former complacency of spirits. Doniphan is a small town of about five hundred inhabitants, and is (or was) situated upon the banks of the Missouri river, but heavy rains and swollen streams hav caused the banks to cave and the river to change its course, and which compelled the railroads to change theirs also, consequently Doniphan has suffered somewhat from these natural changes, and although it once bid fair to become a rising and popular town, it has met with reverses that hav rendered it incapable of any greater developments. Its chief industry is the distilling of wines and liquors, upon which it does a somewhat thriving business, notwithstanding that the sale of such commodities is forbidden within the confines of the state. It has a very large Liberal element in proportion to its population, so much so that scarcely any church can succeed in their midst with the exception of the Roman Catholic. I gave two lectures here before very good audiences—in fact, I was told that I had been favored with the largest audiences that could be got together in this town, except at political gatherings. My hearers seemed well pleased at what was said, and expressed general satisfaction at the result of my lectures. I was very pleased to meet with such an earnest worker and advocate of human liberty as H. Bender, also Dr. E. F. Moore and Mr. Meyer, all of whom expressed a desire that I should visit them again in the near future.

On Wednesday morning I started again on my journey for Eagle, Neb., where I was down for two lectures, and during this journey I was involved in the most serious railway accident of my life. A few miles from Troy Junction the tie-rod of our engin broke, which caused the train to giv several severe jumps, but fortunately it settled down again each time upon the tracks, and when they had succeeded in bringing the train to a standstill the passengers had received nothing more than a severe shaking, and some of them a severe fright. The engineer, however, had been hurled from his cab and was found almost buried in the snow and seriously injured; the fireman had escaped with a slight scalding. Upon examination our engin was found to be in such a dilapidated condition that we were unable to proceed, and this produced the necessity of a five-mile walk to the nearest depot to telegraph news of the disaster and call up a relief engin. We had to wait five hours on the track before help came. The train eventually arrived in Lincoln with a cargo of hungry passengers, who found the nearest lunch counter in less time than it takes to record it. I reached Eagle next morning, and for the first time I realized that this was Thanksgiving—at least, Benjamin Harrison had ordained it so.

Thanksgiving, for what?—
And he muttered a curse—
For the poorest of food,
And an empty purse;
For a life of hard work,
And the shabbiest clothes,
But it's idle to talk
Of a poor man's woes.
Let the rich giv thanks,
It is they who can;
There is nothing to thank
For a laboring man.

At Eagle I was met by J. Q Adams, the president of the Eagle bank, and I soon found myself among warm-hearted and generous friends. I met here H. M. Dopp, Steve Benton, and several other radical thinkers. I gave two lectures here, my first audience being very slim indeed, which was hardly a matter for surprise, the town only numbering about one hundred and forty inhabitants. The smallness of the population, and a severe storm which commenced just before the time of meeting, had, no doubt, a disastrous effect upon my audience. However, I did not curtail my lecture, for I gave the twenty or more present substantially the same as if they had numbered twenty thousand. My second lecture was attended with better results. The inhabitants, no doubt having recovered from the digestiv inconveniences attendant on Thanksgiving, turned out in larger numbers, so that the hall was nearly filled this time. The audience was very attentiv, and at the close of my lecture a local genius attempted to criticise my remarks, but as he insisted upon criticising something that I did not say, and declined to discuss what I did say, he was promptly called to order, and as he was not allowed to hav his own way the discussion fell through. There are quite a number of good and earnest Freethinkers in this little town, among whom are those previously mentioned, also Dr. Davis, P. Frolich, and others, all of whom were well pleased at the general result. Immediately after the lecture I had to take a night train for Hamburg, Ia., where I was engaged for two lectures on Sunday, November 29th. Friends will continue to address me in care of E. A. Stevens, 498 W. Madison street, Chicago.

Subscribers.

The holidays are almost here. Are you ready for them? A gift that would prove acceptable to any Liberal friend, and at the same time keep you in constant remembrance during the year, would be a year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Your own renewal and the new subscription will cost only $5.00.

Why There Are Church Members.

People are nothing if not sociable. It is sociability which causes the mass of humanity to attend church once or twice a week, and the human being who does not wish to meet with other people in some gathering often, is not a true and good man or woman. Many, and in fact the majority, of the people in civilized countries would rather attend some lecture, opera, or public gathering other than a church; but in many little towns there is absolutely no other place which they can attend, so what are they to do? Must they, in order to satisfy that thirst for social intercourse, attend and wink at what they believe to be positivly nonsense in order to be sociable? If they do not believe in the Bible and its teaching and yet attend church they are in a measure hypocrits; but if they do not attend some church or gathering on Sunday they are considered unsociable and odd. If they do attend church in order to save themselvs from the scorn of their fellow-townsmen they must also contribute to the support and thus help to strengthen an enemy to progress and civilization.

The average young people of this age realize the immensity of the holy humbug, but if one of them sees fit to step out of line and declare independence, they are at once the shining mark for holy slurs and social boycott, and more especially is this true in the case of young ladies. Let a young lady in a small town show her contempt of the prevailing religious fad and she might almost as well commit a crime. The old women, at the instigation of the minister and deacons, will at once commence a systematic process of lying and social ostracism calculated to, and almost always successfully, too, drive her back into the fold of the holy fools.

It is noticeable, however, that where a town is large enough to possess some kind of a society of progress which meets at church hours on Sunday all trouble of that nature is overcome. Where there is strength enough to form even a small society it is sufficient to put a stop to the boycott plan, and, being of a more intelligent order than churches usually are, soon takes the lead in the average American town. What a pity then that the Secular Union or some other society of progress cannot be represented in every town, village, and hamlet. There is no mistake but what every town in the United States contains more people who do not believe in the absurdities of the Bible than are represented by any church in the same town or community, and yet there are few towns but what hav several churches, which are also largely kept up by the liberal people, who are too timid to organize a social circle of their own. No doubt the reason for this is that ministers organize churches as a means of obtaining revenue, putting all their time and talents to work to make their business profitable. But why not Liberals do the same? We would surely rather pay a few cents to hear a good lecture than to pay the same or more to sit and be insulted week after week by ignorant assertions about God and his holy methods of dealing with the worms of the earth. By organizing we for less money receive the benefit of two good lectures each Sunday, we escape the finger of scorn which the church points at the man, woman, or child who has the true nobility of character to stand up alone against superstition. By organizing we giv our children a chance to obtain useful knowledge, we save them from the foul breath of superstition and ignorance, and we elevate our neighbors and friends as well as ourselvs by giving them the opportunity to listen to scientific discussions, lectures, and good music, and good morals. A quarter of a century ago such a plan would not hav been accepted so easily as to-day. Twenty-five years ago hell was still blazing in all its glorious wrath, burning up the ungodly, the scientists, the Liberal thinkers, the enemies of God's numberless inhuman creeds, and the little unbaptized infants. What a change now, with hardly a curl of blue smoke or a smell of brimstone issuing from that dreadful inquisition of God. They are endeavoring to fix the date of creation earlier, they are making each day's work represent an age, and some of them even want to represent the day of rest by an age.

Republican forms of government require that the people think, and we must notice that kingdoms and empires and monarchies are falling in all parts of the world and giving place to republics. The government with the greatest number of rulers is the government which is the most liberal and broad-minded, and it is entirely impossible to hav an established government religion where the people are the rulers. It is only such an absolute one-man monarchy as Russia which can in the very face of science compel its people to bow the head and bend the knee in submission to one man's superstition; and such a state of affairs can hardly last through the twentieth century in any part of the earth. Twenty-five years ago, the memory of that good old Quaker, Thomas Paine, was made a by-word and a sneer upon the lips of all church people; to-day they are talking of putting flowers on his grave, because they say he was a deist—that is, he believed there was a God, which is more than the average man with a mind of his own will testify to now. Almost all wise and careful men will say, "We do not pretend to know anything about it, but are always willing to listen to any intelligent discussion of the subject." And that intelligent discussion of all subjects in every town and community is exactly what is most needed at the present time. Some one in each community should see to it that a society is organized. Appoint one of your own number to write a lecture for Sunday reading, or read some one's else lecture. Take it turn about if you hav no leader, but do not compel your children to attend church because they hav no other protection from the slanderous tongue of superstition.

If all the liberal societies could be combined into one and operated on business principles, it would not be many years until a lecture-hall could be built in every town, furnished with a good standard library and a lecturer, and our children as well as ourselvs be protected. What a pride you would take in your beautiful hall, the arrangements, and furnishing the choice library which you would be constantly adding to. Organize a Liberal society in your little town and the churches will lose power at once. To prove this look for a moment and see who the popular ministers are. Are they not the men who deliver scientific lectures with just enough religion interspersed so that they may not be arraigned for heresy? Even then they are tried for heresy; and when they go right on, their congregation stands by them and they are entirely independent of the church. Humanity is curious to learn. If we were not we would never learn. The Bible fixes the date of the creation at about six thousand years ago, so that when a man of science says, "We hav the Chinese history of an eclipse which took place before that time, and which cold figures also show to hav taken place at exactly the time stated," we are curious to learn more about the Bible creation. The only astronomical event noted in the Bible for a landmark other than the creation of the earth in six days and the creations of the sun and moon and stars one afternoon when there was nothing else to do, was the great performance of Joshua when the good book says he commanded the sun and moon to stand still. If this ridiculous event took place, and the sun and moon really appeared to stand still by the earth ceasing to revolve on its axis, then figures lie, for we cannot find any such jog in the universal machinery. The figures fail to show it. There is no emotion in figures, no romance but truth, no fiction, no fable. Such truth interests the present generation more than fiction. "Truth is stranger than fiction," and we would rather listen to truth than to fiction, because it is true. The Liberal society which takes the lead should be the center of all learning as it is learned, and the halls should be the local centers through which that learning is taught and explained. It will be at most but a few years until some such state of society will exist, and why not bring it about as soon as possible, so that some of us older people may die with the peaceful assurance that superstition died before us, and our children are safe from its blight? Down with ignorance and the institutions which dare teach it or oppose the truth of science.

A Concise and Forceful Letter.

From the New York Sun.

It is stated that fifty thousand gospel ministers hav been served with blank petitions for their respectiv flocks to sign, praying Congress to enact unconstitutional "religious legislation" to close the World's Fair upon the Constantine-Heathen Sunday.

If the American government were a church and state government, which it is not, and if all the world who are invited to the Fair knew that this was a Christian nation with a "Christian government," which its father, Washington, declared it was not, and that, if they came from India, from South America, from Spain, China, Africa, Turkey, Russia, France, and England, they would be compelled to lose one-seventh of their time in the observance of a sectarian unscriptural Sabbath, in addition to their own Sabbath, coming upon another day, and they still choose to come, well! But being invited to come, not to an Infidel, an ecclesiastical, Christian, nor even to an American fair, but to a World's Fair, open to Anabaptists, Jews, Buddhists, Mohammedans, who hav their own Sabbath days, to say nothing of the millions of non-sectarians, or the religious people who, like Shakers, regard all days alike, to be kept holy by ceasing thereon to do evil and learning to be and to do good!

Infidels, to church and state governments, like Paine, Franklin, Washington, and Jefferson, wrote and signed the Declaration of Independence and framed a Constitution that expressly forbids all "religious legislation." The "Age of Reason" had arrived, the "Rights of Man" were boldly set forth, and, when "The Crisis" came, the truth prevailed. All men were legally equal and had inalienable right to entire liberty of conscience, even down to the priests of Balaam, who, for their salaries, seek a union with Balak.

Religious freedom, perfect exemption from priestly rule and domination, is the great honor and glory of the secular government of these United States. But "eternal vigilance" will alone maintain it. Under God, we are all indebted to the skeptical classes for our secular government. The Antichristians ought to be thankful to them, for they hav returned good for evil.

Paine was the master spirit of the American Revolution. Washington, whose private secretary he was, declared that Thomas Paine had done more with his pen for the ultimate success of the American Revolution than he had done with his sword.

The priesthood hav whitewashed Washington, who never would go into a steeple house—a church, and hav blackballed, belied, and vilified Paine, as the rebels in our civil war slandered and contemned Lincoln.

By what the church and state Christians hav done in Tennessee without law, we may judge what they will do when they hav the law in their hands. They tore a good American citizen from his home and family, imprisoned him, worried, browbeat, and tortured him to death. His soul in the spiritland is "marching on" to vengeance upon his inquisitors. He was doing what he and all of us hav a perfect United States constitutional right to do, plow our fields whenever we choose. Where is the ecclesiastical court to determin upon which of the seven Sabbath days we must not plow? Could there be a greater absurdity than the stamp upon our coin, "In God we trust," when thousands of good citizens do not believe in any God at all? Yet their inalienable rights remain intact, as do the rights of those who profess to believe there are three Gods, all masculin, ignoring woman. Are there any Christians except Shakers? And are there any human beings in the spirit world, in heaven or hell, or upon this earth, who may not become Christians? "A great company of priests were obedient to the faith." And if the inquisition clergy may become Christians, who shall despair of being saved? Belief is the result of evidence. There is no virtue in it, nor is there any vice in unbelief. It is want of evidence; having evidence, belief is the result.

Jesus said: "My kingdom is not of this world, therefore my servants will not fight." If the chaplain is a Christian, what is he doing in a secular, worldly legislature that is spending the principal revenues of the country in manufacturing war material? And what place has he in the army and navy or on the bloody battlefield? Is it not thirty thousand Balak priests who are going to move heaven and earth to fill their churches and increase their incomes?

Lincoln was an Infidel and became a Spiritualist, so, according to "Free Thought," the Jesuits killed him. Let us hav peace, but not the "peace of Warsaw." Let Infidel, Jew, or Turk be left in perfect liberty of conscience, to do by others as they would be done by. Did Jesus ever denounce the skeptical Sadducees as he did the believing Pharisees?

For untold ages the wise of this world thought that the earth was flat. One man arose who said it was round and that it turned around. The Christian priests arrested, imprisoned, and tortured him to death, just as they hav arrested, imprisoned, and killed King, of Tennessee, who kept the true Sabbath—Saturday—and plowed his field on their Sabbath. Either open the World's Fair upon the seven Sabbath days, or close it upon the seven Sabbath days and tax the church and state fifty thousand Balak priests to pay the outlay and all losses to the exhibitors.

How to Help The Truth Seeker.

1. When renewing get a friend to subscribe and thus save a half dollar apiece.

2. Get your newsdealer to display it on his stand or in his shop window. Be sure that he displays the pictures.

3. Get your newsdealer to keep in stock one or more copies, with your guarantee to take off his hands at the end of the week any that remain unsold. If he exhibits them the pictures alone will sell them.

4. Take a few extra copies and circulate them among your acquaintances. On your request, we will send you back-number sample copies free.

5. Leave a copy occasionally where it will be picked up—in the train, in the factory, in the meeting-room, in the cigar store, in the barber-shop. Leave it picture-side up.

6. Keep in your pocket some of our cheap tracts and when convenient hand one to a friend.

7. Get a new subscriber by persuading some friend to take it.

IN the rational study of nature lie the secrets of knowledge, and every admission of the existence of supernatural influences is a barrier to progress.—Robt. C. Adams.

WAS CHRIST CRUCIFIED?

In the first issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER for the New Year we shall print an article with the foregoing question for its title, by author of "The Socialism of Christ" and "The Virtues and Their Reasons," a System of Ethics for Society and Schools.

THE TRUTH SEEKER will put on its new dress on New Year's, and appear also in a more modern make-up, with all of its old and some new features.

The make-up will be so arranged that the subscribers who desire to forward the paper to semi-Liberal friends but are deterred because of a fear that the pictures will offend their semi-religious sensitivness can remove the objectionable matter without destroying any of the reading matter. And we sincerely trust that those who hav refrained from doing missionary work with the paper on this account will feel their interest revived and intensified and act accordingly.

To Our Subscribers.

We are in sore need of the amounts due on subscriptions and ask everyone who owes us money to be especially prompt in sending it.

This also is the time of year when a great many subscriptions expire, and an immediate renewal will be a favor to us.

Owing probably to the elections and the labor incident to gathering and marketing the great harvests our friends hav neglected to forward what is due us, and we are consequently compelled to somewhat urgently remind them of their remissness. As Mr. Bennett used to say under these circumstances, Friends, let us hear from you.

To the Friends and Subscribers of Freethought.

I sincerely hope that all who hav supported Freethought in the past will aid the work to which it has been devoted by becoming subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER. THE TRUTH SEEKER will carry on the work, but it needs your coöperation. It is a means by which I can reach you and push on the Pacific coast labors. Especially I ask those in arrears to pay what is now due to THE TRUTH SEEKER and place their names upon its list as cordial supporters for the future. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The address of all these is "House of Representativs, Washington, D. C." The letter which it is desired to hav sent to each by as many of their constituents as are in favor of its purpose is as follows:

"..... 189 .

"HON.....MEMBER OF CONGRESS FOR THE DISTRICT OF.....:

"Dear Sir: As one of your constituents I desire to call your attention to a matter of great importance.

"I understand that the American Sabbath Union—an organization working for the revival of a Puritan Sunday observance—has circulated a petition asking your honorable body to attach to any appropriation for the World's Fair to be held in Chicago in 1893 a condition that such Fair shall be kept closed on Sunday.

"I desire to protest against this condition being attached to any appropriation, and to say that if any condition at all is attached it shall be that the Fair is kept OPEN on every Sunday of its continuance. And I respectfully ask you to vote to open the Fair on Sundays if that question shall come before Congress in any shape. And I ask this for these reasons, which are given in a petition to the local directory and national commission, which petition has been signed by thousands of citizens and will be sent to the Fair authorities:

"1. That the American principle of separation of church and state may be maintained.

"2 That public morality may be subserved by providing a substitute for the immoral places to which men may resort when no moral amusements are available.

"3 As a matter of justice to the people of Chicago who hav given of their means to make the Fair possible, tens of thousands of whom can visit the Fair only on a general holiday; and as a matter of justice also to the visitors to the Fair, whose time and means are limited, and who certainly are entitled to great consideration at your hands.

"4 For the public good. The opening of the Fair on Sunday will be for the benefit not only of Chicago, but of the whole country. The rights of no one are infringed, the happiness of no one disturbed. Those who wish to attend can do so; those who do not can otherwise spend the day. This is a solely humanitarian question, a question of human relations and human welfare, and therefore the only standard by which you can decide is that of the public welfare.

"5 It will benefit the Fair, attracting a much larger attendance, interesting more people in it, and increasing its receipts.

"6. To the objection that Sunday opening of the Fair will destroy the day as a rest day, we affirm that the tendency would be exactly the opposit. The more beautiful you make Sunday, the more attractiv, the more noble and varied in its pleasures and instructions, the more difficult it will be to change its character, the less danger there is that employers will ever hav the power to transfer it from its present position to the days of toil. With choice of Sunday occupations reduced to attending church or visiting a saloon, the average workingman would choose to keep on laboring.

"7 Finally: Opening the World's Fair on Sunday will harm no one but the keepers of immoral places, while it will benefit the Fair itself, the people of Chicago, and the visitors to the Fair, thereby conducing to municipal prosperity, individual education, public morality, and the development and good of the whole country.

"Hoping that these reasons will hav weight with you for good, and that you will ever be found on the side of freedom, I remain, Yours truly, ——— ———"

We will forward copies of this printed on note-paper to anyone sending stamps. Each letter may be signed by as many as choose, but it would hav a better effect to hav them sent separately. The Sabbath Union, which has a large fund at its disposal, has sent out fifty thousand contrary petitions to the preachers, who will get them signed and sent to Congress, and the Liberals should be activ in their work of opposition.

Still Another Chance.

If the Sabbatarians are dishonest in their arguments in support of their fad, what shall we say of the remainder of the Christians? And how shall we fitly describe the "prominent gentleman" who figures in the following from the Dayton, O., Evening Herald:

"The following letter was addressed to a prominent gentleman of this city by Col. R. G. Ingersoll. The gentleman, though often requested, has up to this time refused to make it public. In his own language, it is now given for publication for the reasons given herewith:

"'But since he has sold out to the devil in his Chicago speech on liberty, where he ignores the marriage rite, and advises universal divorce, where parties can find some one they like better, and many other things which would be a disgrace to a Christian nation, etc., you are at liberty to publish the following letter:

"'NEW YORK, ———.

"'Mr. ———, Dayton, O.:

"'MY DEAR SIR: It is very gratifying to know that my books are being read in India—glad to know that they are in the way of the hypocritical and idiotic missionaries who are endeavoring to get these people to exchange one superstition for another.

"'You may rest assured that while I liv I shall do what little I can to destroy what is known as "orthodox religion." In my judgment it has covered the face of the world with tears, and the greatest possible good would be its utter destruction.

"'You say in your letter that you hope some time I will "do something for God." I never shall; but I do intend to do something for humanity. If God is infinit he does not need my help. I believe in living in this world for this world, and doing what little we can for ourselvs and our fellow-man. If there is another world, when we get there we can do the same. Very truly yours,

"'R. G. INGERSOLL,
"'Per B.'"

Every reader of the Herald who does not see the report of Colonel Ingersoll's Chicago speech—Liberty for Man, Woman, and Child—will think that he has been advising people to break down family ties and liv like animals, when, as another matter of fact, he advised just the opposit. Here is what he really said, according to the best report made of his speech: "Let me say right here to-night, I regard marriage as the holiest institution among men. Without the fireside there is no human advancement; without the family there is no life worth living. Every good government is made up of good families. The unit of government is the family; anything that tends to destroy the family is perfectly devilish and infamous. I believe in marriage, and I hold in utter contempt the opinions of long-haired men and short-haired women who denounce the institution of marriage. Let me say right here—and I hav thought a good deal about it—let me say right here the grandest ambition that any man can possibly hav is to liv and so improve himself in heart and brain as to be worthy of the love of some splendid woman; and the grandest ambition of any girl is to be worthy of the love and adoration of some magnificent man. That is my idea, and there is no success in life without it. I say it took millions of years to come from the condition of abject slavery up to the condition of marriage. Woman is the equal of the man. She has all the rights I hav and one more, and that is the right to be protected. That's my doctrin. You are married; try to make the woman you love happy; try to make the man you love happy. Whoever marries simply for himself will make a mistake; but whoever loves a woman so well that he says, 'I will make her happy,' makes no mistake. And so with the woman who says, 'I will make him happy.' There is only one way to be happy and that is to make somebody else so, and you can't be happy cross-lots; you hav got to go the regular turnpike road."

And this Christian, who professes not to believe in bearing false witness, says Colonel Ingersoll ignores the marriage rite! The flexibility of the man's conscience seems to be proportioned to his piety, which is deep.

Books in Fine Bindings for Holiday Gifts.

We hav a large number of books suitable for holiday gifts, many of them in extraordinarily fine bindings, and we call the attention of our readers to them, hoping that when selection of presents is made the list will be consulted and purchases made therefrom. Among them are Paine's works, complete, in cloth, $3; leather, red edges, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50; the World's Sages, in same style of binding and at same prices as Paine's works; Ingersoll's Prose Poems, in cloth, $2.50; half morocco, $5; turkey morocco, $7.50; tree calf, $9. These are magnificent volumes. Also his principal lectures bound in one volume for $5. Either of Miss Wixon's books, The Story Hour, Apples of Gold, All in a Lifetime, is very suitable for a present, the first particularly for children. Voltaire's Romances, cloth, $1.50; half calf, $4, is a fine and uncommon work. D. M. Bennett's Around the World, in sets of four volumes, profusely illustrated, red cloth, $6.50, is a splendid present to a friend or to young men and women. It is full of practical to-day information about other countries and the noted things therein. The latest book which the Spiritualists are discussing is, Was Abraham Lincoln a Spiritualist? for $1.50. Helen Gardener's Men, Women, and Gods is a work of great value, $1, as is Winwood Reade's Martyrdom of Man, $1 75; Gibbon's History of Christianity, $2; Darwin's Origin of Species and Descent of Man, and others of his works. A catalog containing these and hundreds more—Freethought, scientific, medical, social, as well as standard—will be sent on receipt of a request for same.

A Great Book.

Our Bible Picture Book will contain about four hundred pages, one-half of which will be full-page pictures and one-half reading matter, relating to the stories which the pictures illustrate. The text will lead to a full understanding of the tale, even as the artist's work illustrates it, with an electric searchlight brilliance unsurpassed by the torch of the golden goddess Diana on the Garden tower. Young people can learn more about the Old Testament and its heroes by reading this book than by reading the Old Testament itself. It is much more easily comprehended, and is written in more chaste language.

There will be twenty-six chapters in the book, twelv of which are completed, as follows:

I. Adventures of Adam.
II. The Origin of the Young Men's Christian Association.
III. Sustaining a Theory.
IV. Some Giants.
V. The Adventures and Work of Noah.
VI. A Hunting Anecdote.
VII. Abraham, Christ's Great Ancestor.
VIII. A Queer Family.
IX. Isaac and His "Sister."
X. One of Twins.
XI. Jacob and Esau.
XII. Joseph, the Man of Dreams.

The book will afford many a hearty laugh, while we hav not forgotten to make it a solid attack upon the superstition which can venerate and believe the tales told in the Old Testament. So far as it goes it shows that book in its true colors, though of course we hav omitted the Old Testament obscenity in order to make our work one admissible in all families and readable by all ages and sexes.

The price of our work is $1. Orders will be cheerfully booked now and filled as soon as the work comes from the press.

A Chance for Reform.

The most dishonest folks in the world in argument are the Sabbatarians. Their one great contention for Sunday as the Sabbath is a most preposterous falsehood, and with this as a base, they rear structure after structure of transparent lies.

A writer in the Christian Statesman says the liquor-dealers of Chicago desire Sunday opening of the Fair and also the opening of museums as allies of the saloons. We suppose these statements are made to disparage the movement for Sunday opening by throwing its supporters into bad company.

This is as dishonest as it can be, for as a matter of fact saloon-keepers generally do not want places of resort other than their own opened to the public, and the Chicago saloon-keepers are pretty generally known to be, as a matter of business, on the side of the Sabbatarians.

We wish the fanatics would reform their morals.

Editorial Notes.

CITIZENS who sell their votes at election are the vermin of politics. They must be exterminated. So says the Catholic Review; but a practical application of its determination would lessen the membership of its church wonderfully.

WE wish our readers would send us the names and addresses of all the Liberals they know who do not take THE TRUTH SEEKER, in order that we may forward them sample copies. It is our earnest desire to double our subscription list, and we ask the kind coöperation of all friends of Freethought.

AND now the Catholics want to boycott the World's Fair because of the secretary of the local directory. The Catholic Review says: "While Mr. Butterworth remains secretary of the executiv committee of the Columbian Exposition, Catholics will want to hav nothing to do with it. His continuance in office will be a detriment to the Fair."

THE only advice or exhortation that we hav seen in a long time in a Catholic paper with which we could agree is the following: "For the long winter evenings get books. Fifty good volumes that could be procured for fifty dollars would be of more benefit to a family than a piano costing five hundred. They would be more ornamental than bric-a-brac or pottery. They would be more profitable than money in bank. A home without books is like a house without windows. Get books!" And if this advice were followed judiciously there would be fewer Catholics in the world. Books stating facts are the enemy of religion.

THE Chicago Evening Journal says: "One of the best institutions of Chicago is the Secular Union, with its two courses of Sunday evening lectures. One course of lectures is given at Dearborn Hall, near the corner of West Madison and Halsted streets. At this course, after the lecture an hour or so long, a discussion is held for forty minutes, giving each speaker five minutes' time. There are many present at each meeting who represent the advanced and radical thought of the times, and their comments on the lecture of the evening, whether approving or criticising, are instructiv and of interest. The other course is given at the hall 116 Fifth avenue. At this place discussion does not follow the lecture, which is expected to be a more elaborate presentation of the speaker's opinions on the subject which he discusses. It is greatly to the credit of John F. Geeting, Esq., that to his interest in popular questions and his public spirit is due the organization of this society, and the establishment of this double lecture course. The lecturers take no pay, and there is no charge for admission. A collection is taken up each evening simply to pay the hall rent, there being no other expenses. A Sunday evening cannot be better spent by any thoughtful mind than in attendance at one of these lectures."

Unselfish Devotion to the Cause.

FORT MAGINNIS, MONT., Nov. 21, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am an old Infidel, who has taken the Investigator from its start, and formerly took THE TRUTH SEEKER, but, having more papers than I had time to read, stopped taking it, and only take it now to help the cause, as I hav not always found it to my liking, particularly the coarseness of its illustrations. The last received, however, "The Sacred Scarecrow," from my standpoint is good.

On God and Other Spookish Creatures.

PHILADELPHIA, PA, Dec. 10, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The three books came duly to hand, and giv entire satisfaction. The "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book" is immense. It is a complete exposure of Gods, priests, preachers, and prophets. It shows plainly the manner of men who foster superstitious fancies against right, reason, and science.

I notice on the editorial page of your issue of the 5th inst. a subject which seems to be in controversy, as to whether the idea of God is innate or not. I think it highly probable that the idea of Gods with the human family is innate or inborn. The idea of God with man is but a superstitious fancy. Just as readily one might hav an idea of any other kind of spooks. It may be said, and correctly so, too, that superstition is inborn, from which fact man can think Gods, angels, devils, ghosts, hobgoblins, witches, banshees, and a thousand other supernatural beings of a like bad character. Superstition abides with ignorance, and God abides with superstition. Therefore, if the idea of God is innate, it does not prove the fact that Gods do exist. It cannot be said that the knowledge of truth is inborn, yet we know that truth does exist, and when ideas and beliefs are confronted with the truth, Gods and spooks disappear. If God's existence is a truth, then that truth should fit with every truth, but many truths already discovered point against the existence of Gods.

It is a notable fact that as soon as learning has banished superstition from the mind the Gods go with it. Superstition is a disease which learning cures. Superstition is the first cause, a belief in the Gods and their families of spooks is the effect of this cause.

Ignorance and superstition are with man at his birth, from which fact we freely admit that we always hav something to learn. Gods and every manner of hobgoblins must be classified under the one head—the spook species.

Religion, take heed, for the bright light of learning
Illumins the world's sluggish night,
And reason's proud billows, in majesty swelling,
Are drowning the creed's horrid blight.
For the right and the wrong the battle's now waging;
The steed of progression is shod;
The crisis is coming, and learning shall conquer,
For truth is more mighty than God.

The Donkeys Kicked the Dead Lion.

AUBURN, Nov. 29, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: We hav had a death in the family—of the head of the house, one whom we loved and adored, whose memory we hold sacred. He was a stanch Agnostic and died firm in that belief. His death was calm and peaceful, making all the arrangements for his funeral, calling no minister to administer any last rites, nor wishing none of the Christians' prayers. The Christians were wild—sadly disappointed, their hopes blasted. They contented themselvs by saying everything possible about him. The preacher preached on it. Tney gathered in groups and talked of him being in hell. Not one cheering word did they hav for the poor sick widow who probably will soon follow her husband. The Christians reported that he cried and yelled for mercy during his last hours, all of which was false and simply told to carry their point. But there were those of the orthodox belief at his bedside who are truthful and honest people and they hav pronounced it all a malicious falsehood. He was a man of great intelligence; far ahead of his race; had great reasoning faculties. Charles Griffin—for that is his name—was far in advance of his race, and it will take half a century for them to understand what he was talking about, much less catch up to him in knowledge. He was my foster-father, and his wife proves to be a dear mother to me. I miss him every time I take up THE TRUTH SEEKER. Then it is I miss him to read to, and some one to comment upon the subjects we read. He being a man of seventy-five years and having had poor health for six years, and his wife for five years, all has fallen upon me. My burdens at the present are very heavy. But I will pull through in time. Nevertheless, the paper must be paid for. Not seeing any way that I can remit at present I will be obliged to ask you to stop it until I am able to catch up. But I may hav a chance to do so sooner than I expect. But I will surely remit and take the paper again, as it is impossible to be contented without it. It is sad and lonely amongst these howling Christians. But we shall remain firm and unshaken. I am more determined than ever. I will send you one of his pamphlets written to enlighten his race. But they were afraid of it. The ministers told them they would be damned if they read it.

Sunday in the Land of the Free and Home of the Brave.

Nov. 28, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The following note I was induced to write on account of the increasing demands of pietists for laws to force their views on the vast majority of the people. I asked one of our local papers to publish it, but they declined. Why, I do not know; but I suppose, in this case, the press is afraid of the pulpit.

It strikes me very forcibly that it is about time to call a halt on our "unco guid" people. They are so anxious to reform the world that they seem to hav no idea of the rights of others. In many towns they hav come to the conclusion that common, every-day people hav no rights that they are bound to respect. In many places they hav so terrorized the people that they dare not sell a glass of soda water or milk or a cigar on Sunday, for fear of fine and imprisonment. And now they are trying to stop the sale of Sunday newspapers, and all this in the land of the free and the home of the brave. Why is it that so brave a people will allow themselvs to be bulldozed by so small a minority?

Now they are striving to shut up the World's Fair at Chicago on Sunday, knowing that, it being a day of rest, thousands of people that could not afford to lose time to visit that grand exposition of the progress of the world, would be deprived of the opportunity by so doing. These "unco guid" people who pretend to be such enemies to the saloon would giv the masses no other means of amusement but that the saloon furnishes, on the day of all others that they could spare time to see the wonderful ingenuity of man. O hypocrisy! where is thy shame?

I think the Protestant leaders hav the least tact of any set of men who profess to want to gain the good will of the outside world, as they term it, in doing all they can to make Sunday miserable to all but themselvs. The Catholics show their superior tact by not curtailing the innocent pleasure of their people. If they only attend church once on Sunday and pay their assessments, they can enjoy themselvs in their own way the balance of the day, and if they pay when called on very regular attendance is not insisted on; but some or most of the Protestant churches would deprive the people on that day of all social pleasures, and make the day a day of gloom, and the people look upon them as their enemies. No wonder their pews are empty, and men prefer the Sunday newspaper to the bill of fare offered by the churches. They must try another way and try to brighten life on Sunday, instead of making it more gloomy, before they will get the mass of the people to believe they are their friends. They must quit this thing of closing museums, parks, picture galleries, World's Fairs, etc., on Sunday to the people whom they profess to want to improve and draw under their influence, if they are to hav any influence in forming or reforming the character of this great nation.

Paine—Freethought at the Fair—Spiritualism.

BANDON, ORE., Nov. 28, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Thinking you might want to hear from this part of the vineyard, I will write you a few lines.

I got into the TRUTH SEEKER family via Freethought.

We are going to hav a grand celebration on Thomas Paine's birthday, and I hope that all the lovers of liberty will meet in their respectiv places and do honor to his memory. I think it is as little as we can do to blot out the stigma that has attached to his name for the past hundred years. I believe he did more to weaken the structure of orthodox Christianity than any other man, and when we consider the age in which he lived, hemmed in on all sides by bigotry and superstition, his courage and fidelity to truth cannot be over-estimated; so let us ever revere his memory.

I see that there is some talk already of a Freethinkers' gathering at the World's Fair. What a treat it would be to see all the foremost liberators of humanity from dogma and superstition from all over the world, and hear them giv their experiences in their different fields of labor. I would suggest that steps be taken at once to secure a suitable place for the occasion.

I notice in "Letters from Friends" that quite a number of your correspondents are finding fault with Spiritualism. Now, while I hav never had sufficient evidence of a conscious existence after the death of the body, I do not find fault with my neighbor who has, or thinks he has. If the phenomena of Spiritualism do not demonstrate a future existence of mankind, science and investigation will discover the fact; while ridicule and non-investigation will accomplish nothing. I would like to ask you or any of your correspondents to name one thing that is free from fraud of some kind. If we are to condemn everything or reject it because a few mercenary and unscrupulous persons will practice fraud, I do not know what we could accept. We would hav to giv up eating and drinking, for fraud is practiced in our food and drink. There is fraud practiced in medicin, in land transactions, in railroad bonds, also in law. We should be compelled to giv up all kinds of government because fraud is practiced by a few individuals. Almost anything that you can mention that is in existence is fringed more or less with fraud of some kind, yet underlying all this there are both good and truth in them all, and may there not be some good and truth in Spiritualism? I am a Liberal, not by name alone, but by practice. To call a man a fool and dupe and credulous simply because he has traveled a different road than I hav, and necessarily found different evidence, and has come to different conclusions, is not the right kind of Liberalism; not the kind that will make the human race any better than it is to-day.

Yours for more Liberalism, G. E. MOULTON.

Are We on the Eve of a Great Discovery?

DES MOINES, IA., Dec. 2, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav noticed several letters in your columns in regard to the "Georgia Magnet," and having been one of a committee of twelv to test her power, I will make a brief statement or two favoring the side of the "Magnet." Our committee gave her fair tests, and all were of the opinion that she possesses a power, not supernatural but natural. Some of her feats were so plain as to be beyond question. Mark this one: A little boy nine years of age placed his hands in hers at arm's length. Now, what this power is, or just how it works, I am unable to say; but I do know this—a number of the committee, the writer included, could not lift him from the floor. This is a fair test. The boy had no skirts which might be used to hide any mechanical contrivance to fasten him to the floor. It was a clean-cut feat, and is sufficient of itself to prove that Annie Abbott has a remarkable power. The writer lifted the boy from the floor easily as soon as Mrs. Abbott let go his hands. Now, is this not sufficient? Why be so skeptical? I am a Materialist. I neither believe in Gods, spirits, spooks, or devils, but I do know that she possesses a phenomenal power not common to other human beings, and I think it consists of elements which—in some cases—nullify the force of gravity. One more feat: She placed her hand on either side of the writer's head and lifted him from the chair without either pulling upward or pressing against the face. Allowing that she exerted a force of five pounds in this way, then I ask, by what means were the remaining one hundred and fifty pounds lifted? Through spirit agency? No, no. She said to me, "Of all the 'isms,' Spiritism is the farthest from explaining my power." Yet she produced the so-called spirit raps almost instantly. An understanding of this force would doubtless explain much of the phenomena of Spiritism.

The best explanation that I can giv is that she possesses a power over electric attraction in animate beings—fish excepted—to nullify it or change its direction. Another point worthy of thought—she cannot exert her power to any extent with women.

I hav read two pamphlets written by scientific men in explanation of this force, and I learn from these men that she possesses sufficient electricity by which, with proper appliances, messages could be transmitted a considerable distance.

I hav also read from a Manitoba paper a long article exploding the South Dakota man's explanations, and I think it was effectually done. The lady in Chicago to whom reference has been made is not Mrs. Abbott. The papers state that she is in England, and that the prince of Wales has recently "given her a lift by failing to lift her."

N. ZEDIKER.

Miscellaneous.

LEXINGTON, KY., Nov. 21, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Much is said at the present period of individual improvement, but Christian thinkers do not recognize the idea that Freethought is more congenial to the noblest mentality than a constant reference to lucubrations of great thinking men who are supposed to control the human mind and giv tone to society views. If Herbert Spencer fails to direct us right, we cannot attribute this want of success to the fact that he fawns upon the masses instead of instructing them. But what shall we say of Gladstone, who cannot relinquish the idea that the Jews hav had a holy mission on earth; that their sin and repentance is the great Pecksniffian piece of strategy, the stupendous lesson, which has profited our morals as much as Greek culture has our minds? Nehemiah also, I suppose, might be said, according to Prideaux, to elaborate luxury upon the most approved and sinless plan, as a Hebrew Turveydrop might be expected to do. The fact, however, is patent with us that the kindness of the Jews is more to be depended on, in business, than their conscience. We will not refuse to admit that a power in society like Gladstone, if not a powerful mind, will occasionally stumble on something great and admirable. So it is when he speaks of the great laws of kindness and justice, telling us they are written upon the human mind, and nothing can efface them. This suggestion is depreciated by Cardinal Gibbons, another leader toward the gate of heaven. Does he forget, as he thinks upon his knees to some higher authority (if such process could be called brain-exercise), that justice could not breathe in the air of slavery in which we languish—that the great borrower called religion could not suggest anything to elevate the mind which had not been previously ground into us by some lover of equal rights? Can a person who has known nothing but servitude originate a luminous idea, when the truth exists that there is no aristocracy of thought; when the beggar over his crust can wear brighter gems of intellect upon his brow than a besotted king, most Christian, even upon his throne?

Herbert Spencer imagins that women hav not the talents of statesmen, although it is well known that the best of them hav an intense hatred of tyranny and partial reforms. One rift in the lute mars the most exquisit music—one impure stain upon a system of morals drags it back to infamy.

"Tolerably moral." So of a loaf of cake: the sugar was not very good, the flour, eggs, and spice were defectiv—do you want any of it? Dr. Carus has much to say of the weakness of women; so had St. Paul. There is no nationality about the thoughts of the highest range of philosophers such as Hegel, Kant, Goethe, Plato. Let us cling to their generalizations. An opinion is not to be swallowed; it must be put to the test. But our Ingersoll—yes, he is ours—flung a handful of diamonds into the columns of the glorious TRUTH SEEKER when he declared that with regard to men and women he believed in equal rights!

Plato, as well as other great thinkers, would never hav discountenanced woman if she had knelt at his feet and implored him, at least, to giv her a chance to exercise and improve her talents which bear upon the welfare of the human race. ALHAZA.

A Stirring Antipapal Appeal—None too Strong.

NEW YORK, Nov. 30, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I am convinced that we Liberals reading THE TRUTH SEEKER cannot be satisfied with the progress of Liberalism in the United States, after reading the fifteenth annual report of the American Secular Union. My object in writing these few lines is to make some inquiries, and offer one suggestion.

Why cannot the Liberals of the United States unite in gaining one point at a time? For example, the abolition of the parochial schools of the United States. Our public schools are state institutions, established by the state and supported by the state, institutions from which the rising generations are to fill up the ranks of citizenship, institutions the citizen should look upon with satisfaction to himself. The rising generation should emerge hence, sustaining our Constitution as the founders of this republic intended it should be, free from creed and ever affording its citizens equality before the law whatever his so-called religious convictions may be.

These institutions are sacred to all lovers of justice and equality, and any interference therewith must be disloyalty to the citizens of the United States, disloyalty to our institutions and general government. Our Constitution reads, "Congress shall make no law establishing religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." Parochial schools are not prohibited by Congress (church schools, as they hav their origin in the church, and under dictation from the church they are conducted). There is an establishment of religion, as Congress permits it; while the Constitution of the United States forbids the same.

From the fact religious schools are unconstitutional a permission to establish the same must be an establishment of religion.

I ask, when orders from Rome were issued to the priesthood in the United States to establish parochial schools throughout the land, was there no protest? Was there no protest at this gross imposition thrust upon our government, and in violation of our Constitution?

By this imposition they are practically saying to the American people: "Your public schools are not good enough for the adherents of our church. We ignore your Constitution and deliberately establish church schools in your midst. Our church is above your institutions, and we intend to sustain it, and increase its faith in America in spite of your Constitution. And our premeditated design is to withdraw the patronage from your public schools to the extent of our influence and power, for the sole purpose of building up the power and influence of the Catholic church in the United States."

After tolerating this much can we wonder we are asked for the public funds to support these schools? Is it not high time we hav protested against church schools? We want none but state schools. I ask, Why can we not preserve the Constitution against this religious interference?

I ask how Liberals expect to bring about new laws for taxing church property, etc., when we are unable to keep the old ones from infringement. Could not all our force be concentrated to one point—that of sustaining our Constitution as it is, free from religious interference? Hav we not the right to abolish the church schools as unconstitutional? Can we draw up a petition to be signed by as many citizens as can be reached who indorse the separation of church and state, and forward the petition to Congress protesting against Congress allowing the establishing of parochial schools in the United States? If we fail in a petition, why cannot this question of separation of church and state be put to a vote before the whole people of the United States? If this government is a democracy, why cannot this be done? We want no foreign institutions established in this country. We are Americans, and capable of establishing institutions for America and the American people without dictations from Rome, or any other country. Cannot every intelligent citizen be self-convinced that this establishing church schools in the United States by the Catholic church is a premeditated disloyalty to our government?

Are we going to tolerate it? And how long?

A few years ago while attending a public marriage at a Catholic church in a New Jersey town, the priest officiating seemed to take advantage of (while having a number of Protestants present) the situation, and informed his listeners emphatically: "We [the Catholics] were before governments and will be after governments." Such is the language of an exiled priest from Germany—exiled for disobeying the law of the land by persisting in establishing parochial schools in his own nativ country. A number of priests were exiled from Germany and settled here in our Western states, where they can establish parochial schools, so we can tolerate what Germany would not—disloyalty to the government. Liberals, this is strong language: "We are above governments; were before governments and will be after governments." Liberals, are the people of the United States going to stand this disloyalty to our government? and how long? Under the teachings of the Catholic church Catholics cannot be good citizens. Their church is first, and citizenship a second consideration. Is this not enough to stir every Liberal citizen to effort to keep our institutions free from any religious interference, the only way to keep the enemy out?

Yours for equality of citizenship, K.

Ironclad Reasoning.

INDIAN GROVE, MO., Nov. 12, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Having been an aggressiv Agnostic for about twelv years, and having been many times engaged discussing the numerous points at issue between myself and the advocates and defenders of the Christian religion, I hav arrived at the conclusion, relativly speaking, that the difference between us is not so great as might at first sight appear to the superficial observer. Now let us see.

All must admit that there are a multitude of religions extant in the world. The Christian religion rejects them all but the religion of Christ. We are both of the same opinion with regard to the religion of Mohammed. We agree that the Prophet was an impostor, and that the entire system is of human origin, and that the Koran is not a divinely inspired book. And yet, though the religion of the Prophet sprang up eight hundred years after Christ, it rules supremely over the hearts and consciences of two hundred million souls. All the arguments advanced in support of Christianity may with equal potency and effect be offered by the followers of Islam in support of the religion of Mohammed. The Koran to them is the only book that offers a solution to the grave and complex problem of human destiny. Annihilate that book and you blot out the only star of hope that ever cast its beacon-light across the turbid waters of the dark river. Destroy that book and the last vestige of buoyant hope dies out in the heaving breast of the grief-stricken survivor and friend, and is buried forever with the lonely occupant of the silent tomb!

Buddha lived and taught his disciples on the historic banks of the Ganges six hundred years before Christ, and to-day his followers number four hundred millions and upward—near one-third of the entire population of the whole world. They hav their sacred writings that profess to make known the final destiny of man. They, like the Mohammedans, can submit as good reasons why I should become a Buddhist as can be offered in support of the claims of Christianity. In fact, about the same can be said of all other known systems of mythology. But I do not believe in the religion of Buddha. Neither does my Christian friend. He rejects all known theories and systems of religion except one. I just take one advanced step and reject them all. I reject them all on exactly the same principles that my Christian friend rejects all but Christ. Some religions, though, as systems of ethics, are superior to others. A great many Infidels, Atheists, and Agnostics acknowledge Christianity to be a superior religion, though of purely human origin. But we must not forget that the Caucasian race is a superior race. Their arts and inventions are superior. Their social, educational, and political institutions are superior. And their system of ethics is superior to that of all others. Is it strange, therefore, that they should develop a superior system of religion? Intelligent persons, if inclined to be religious, generally embrace Christianity. If superiority is an evidence of inspiration, are not the thoroughbred shorthorn or the famous Hereford breeds of cattle, that are so much superior to the old grades of scrub stock, divinely inspired? If not, why not?

Christians undertake to picture the consequences that would ensue should it be discovered and become generally known that Christianity is not true; and they spread on the canvas of man's elastic imagination a scene of anarchy and chaotic confusion of moral principles, and consequent degradation and social depravity, such as never before existed on earth, and then boldly affirm that Infidels to the Christian religion hav brought about the result; ignoring the fact that the perpetrators and abettors of this infamous humbug, Christianity, by their unscrupulous mendacity hav contributed largely to the cause of this unfortunate state of affairs. The true source, however, of all this contemplated disaster and woe may be found not in the fact that men hav been infidel to the Christian religion. No, a thousand times no!

But it is to be found in the more significant fact that man in his fidelity to the Christian religion has been unfaithful to the duties and obligations of an honest, upright life. It is remarkable that Christians can rely with such confidence on the opinions of such men as Webster, Jackson, Adams, Carlyle, and others expressed in attestation of their belief in the divine inspiration of the Holy Queer. Not one of these men ever claimed to know anything at all about the alleged inspiration of the Bible. With them, as with all others, it was purely a matter of faith predicated on hearsay evidence. They did not know, but simply gave their opinion. But men differ largely in opinion with regard to things that come under their immediate observation. Looking at things from different standpoints they arrive at different conclusions. In fact, it is the most difficult thing on earth to settle anything definitly before the bar of public opinion. No, sir, your witnesses cannot be depended upon. They know nothing about the case in hand. Were they present to-day they could not for the life of their souls settle the question. Christ may hav had an actual existence, but they know not whether he was human or divine. They know not whether he was slain on Calvary, or killed at the battle of Bull Run. Men's opinions cannot be accepted as evidence in the case. Respectfully, W. E. WALTON.

P. S.—On last Sunday the skeptic Hume was quoted from the pulpit as saying, That Socrates died like a philosopher, but Christ died like a god! Is this a correct statement? Has anyone a conception of how a god would die?

W. E. WALTON.

Unfortunate Honesty—Lawyers—Preachers' Extortions—Chess—Hairworms—Finance.

HARTFORD, KAN., Nov. 23, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I like THE TRUTH SEEKER better than any other periodical I know of. I am so poor that I can no longer afford to take a newspaper, and hav to borrow the most of my reading. I will tell you why I am poor. I was born a sickly, puny child, and took vast quantities of medicin. Up to my sixth year I was constantly under the doctor's care. From 1880 to 1883 I traveled about through three or four states for my health. From 1878 to 1884 I was not able to do any work. I hav a large family, and for a number of years paid considerable money annually to the support of the church, besides medicin and doctors' bills. My father at last helped me to purchase a small farm here, but I hav no team, and am not able to cultivate it, although I hav performed an immense amount of labor on the place, improving, repairing, and tending small fruit and garden-truck patches and fencing. Last month a prairie fire came along and swept through my farm and orchard, burning up crops and doing damage to trees. By friendly help my house was saved. The people of Kansas are whole-souled and liberal, and always ready to lend a hand to help a neighbor. I hav studied law and been admitted to the bar, but I began the study too late in life ever to hope to reach eminence. Besides, the people here say I am too honest for a lawyer. Perhaps I am like the young man who was about to become a candidate for office on the Alliance ticket. He was objected to because he was a lawyer, but his father told them that his son was not lawyer enough to hurt him any. My health since 1884 has improved so much that I can do a day's work occasionally; and if I do not get something to do here that will make me a living soon, I shall sell out and go where I can get a start. I once made money at stock-raising in Illinois, but the preachers and doctors hav got all my money away from me, and my forty acres of land brings me very little money after taxes and repairs are taken out. If I sell out I will invest $5 in THE TRUTH SEEKER anyhow, to keep my mind free from priestcraft while I do liv.

I want to tell you something about what the churches are doing here. The Methodist church has about three hundred members, and the pastor, A. R. McLean, is a young man and a bachelor, and gets a salary of $1,000 a year with parsonage thrown in; but there seems to be some difficulty in raising the aforementioned salary. Brother Welch, an aged pilgrim of over eighty-five years, an exemplary old gentleman who has probably given a good-sized fortune in his lifetime to support the clerical lazzaroni, has recently been turned out in the cold and barren regions of the excommunicated, because, owing to a decline in his finances, he was not able to contribute to the full extent of his assessment for the support of this strong and healthy young pastor. A young lady who is trying to support herself by the trade of milliner, Clara Jewett by name, has been required to pay $25 this year to oil the tongue of the aforesaid dispenser of free salvation. These are only specimens of numerous cases illustrating the fact that the preaching of the gospel means "deliverance of captivs," "loosing the bonds of servitude," and "the poor hav the gospel preached to them," etc. I told a young Democrat the other day that the churches had all climbed on the Democratic platform now. "Why," said I, "the tariff plank of your platform says 'for revenue only,' and that is the principle which rules the churches."

Concerning the wheat and chess question, I hav a narrativ to relate. Mortimer Buck, my wife's father's uncle, who resides on a large farm near Fort Madison, Ia., and whose veracity will not be disputed by those who know him, gave me the following account of his experiment. Mr. Buck is now over eighty-five years of age, and the statement was made to me nearly twenty years ago. Mr. Buck said that he had occasion to sow into wheat a large field upon which wheat had never grown. He took the wheat to the mill in Fort Madison to hav it cleaned, and when he was about to sow it several persons remarked that they had never seen wheat so thoroughly cleaned from chess and every other ingredient except pure, full-grained wheat. This wheat was sown in the fall, and a wet, open winter followed. In many places the water stood in pools, and much of the wheat in those places was drowned and frozen out. At harvest time the low places bore chess, and nothing but chess; while in other places no chess could be found. If there was chess in the seed (which Mr. Buck says there was not), I do not see how it could all gravitate to the low places, since chess (or cheat as it is usually called in the West) is a much lighter grain than wheat. That it would float more readily than wheat is doubtless true; but the top or surface of water is a poor place to sprout wheat or any other grain.

In regard to those hair-snakes, I hav never observed any, but I think that there is one fact related by Mrs. Slenker which goes far toward proving the transformation, and that is, the finding of a bunch or bunches of twisted horsehair in pools of water by the roadside partially transformed into living animals. I can discover no intrinsic improbability in the theory to anyone who believes in the possibility of spontaneous generation.

I wish that Mr. Hertwig would elaborate his silver views for the benefit of THE TRUTH SEEKER readers. It seems to me that there is some of that famous "sweet reasonableness" in his theory. At least it cannot be disputed that any considerable coinage of depreciated silver dollars, even the present rate of coinage, is a dangerous experiment. Making a silver dollar to contain a dollar's worth of bullion silver would most likely cause it to be exported to even gold standard countries, and render our gold circulation more independent of foreign control. A. H. DARROW.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Bessie's Prayer.

I know a little girl some five years old or less,
Bright, careless, and happy, good, bad and best;
Curly hair and brightest eyes has little Bess,
Mischievous and naughty, but a sweeter child was ne'er caressed.

Good to Rover—"Here, doggie! some butter to make you fat!"
—Bad to me—she has puss and six kittens in my best hat.
Best to her mamma, for the philosophical elf
Has fully impressed her with forgivness itself.

Once when Bess climbed to the tempting, but forbidden shelf,
Just to look at the fruit cake by herself,
And at the very edge a juicy plum
Was soon displaced by Bessie's finger and thumb.

Bess had eaten the plum and just climbed down,
When mamma came and with a frown,
For she the broken cake did discern.
And to the culprit spoke with deep concern,

"It's strange," said mamma, "that in this house
I can't keep a cake—for that troublesome mouse
Gets the first mouthful and the big plum—
Bessie, what is on your first finger and thumb?"

"On my finner an' tum, mamma; which one?"
"Your right one, Bess." "Dis one?" "Yes!"
"Oh, dat is des from my chewing gum.
Mamma, de mousey eat de cake; I seed him run!"

"Bess, you are altogether too sly—
How dare you stand and face me with a lie?
And still you stick to it—can't you tell the truth?
You are a poor pattern for a Bible Ruth."

"Well, mamma, oo is bigger, so was Ruth,
An' if I tole all ye trufe,
Oo would be mad as mad tould be,
And I des lies so oo wouldn't punis' me."

"You naughty girl, to your closet and prepare,
And to Jesus offer a penitent prayer;
Ask his forgivness for stealing this cake,
And close the petition with amen for his sake."

To the closet went Bessie not wholly impressed
With discretion, or valor, or the way to get rest;
Thus her petition of reason poured forth,
And to the reader unvails its value and worth.

She closed up the door, which made it all dark,
But kept her eyes open his presence to mark;
"Desus, is oo weally here? Where is oo Desus?
Des take me on oo lap, dat is forgivness;

"Den I tan put my arms around your neck
An' hug an' tiss oo, jess so jolly,
Like I do papa, an' oo dust love me a whole peck,
And tell me you 'ittle angels and 'ittle dolly.

"O shaw! dare is nobody here, not a mousey;
What he stay here for? The dark makes me sleepy,
And I'll tell mamma dis de place to put de cake,
For if it is in de dark I tan't see it; Desus sake—Amen."

The mother, who, close to the door, still brooding the sin,
With ideas of atonement and hard disciplin,
Was moved with compassion from her fiercer despair,
While in thoughtful conviction she sank down in a chair.

Bess, as directed, had closed her petition,
Then from the closet emerged, but not satisfied,
And with new dispensation and ready conviction,
She climbed into her mother's lap to decide.

"Mamma, dare is no one in dare, did oo fink de was?
But dare ain't! Taus I talked and felt all,
And dare is no Desus, nor nuffin else; taus
I felt all ye room, on de floor an' de wall;

"And mamma, you dess you put cake in de dark closet,
If I don't see it I won't touch it at all;
But dess div me a 'itt'e piece 'fore oo put it away,
And send me to papa when you want me to pray."

UNCLE JACK.

A Chapter from Life.—(Concluded).

On a third occasion this lady noticed that the fowls, all of a sudden, stood still, turning an eye upward, and gazing intently on something, and she asked the meaning of it. She was told there was a hawk sailing among the clouds, and that the cock, having seen it first, sounded the note of alarm to his numerous family. The lady stepped out from under the shade of the tree where she was standing, and when it was pointed out, saw the hawk, apparently no bigger than a speck. In a moment a piercing scream was heard among the hens, and down came the voracious hawk, picked up a little chicken, and away he went. Then the lady could not be made to believe that the hawk, being so high up in the air, could possibly see so small an object on the earth as a little chicken. But one of our country lassies explained the fact to the interesting ignoramus by saying to her that the eye of the whole hawk family of birds was both a telescope and a microscope—a telescope half a mile up in the sky, and able to change it into a microscope by the time he descended upon his victim. The lady was a very pious Presbyterian, and thought it strange that a benevolent God would arrange things so that hawks should prey upon helpless little chickens, and form their talons and beaks expressly for the purpose of catching and tearing them to pieces as food. But our country girl reminded her that either God was not benevolent, or that he had no power in the case, for that in the air, upon the earth, and in the sea, the stronger animals all lived by devouring the weaker.

This lady was a Philadelphian, and before her month's visit was ended she found that farmers liv in a great big world of plants and animals, the study of which is a school of delight to all those who are endowed with inquiring minds and like that field of research. With a good library in the house, and countless object-lessons outside, minds that are alert are never subject to lonesomeness. Even in winter, when the plant world has undressed and gone to sleep, we can study the habits of the horses and colts, the cows, calves, and sheep, who receive their daily food at our hands. The only drawback to this pure pleasure is, that when the butcher, or the horse-dealer, comes along these personal friendships hav to be broken up; for man is a carnivorous as well as gramnivorous animal.

There are two things which all boys and girls ought to do as soon as they cut their eye-teeth. First, to settle upon a plan of life whereby they will be able to earn an independent living. A cold hell may be as uncomfortable as a hot one, and those persons are bound to experience it who allow their youth and middle age to pass away without laying up their surplus evenings so that when old age comes with its infirmities, and they are no longer able to work, they can hav around them the substantial comforts of life in their own houses, and owe no man anything in the shape of money. To execute this determination should be the ambition of every young man and woman.

Then, secondly, all young people should store their minds with knowledge as food for future thought and their memories with stores of beautiful poetry, so that, when they are driven in from the activ world without doors to their firesides within, they can enjoy these treasures of delight and not suffer the hell of ennui. All pleasures not enjoyed in moderation hav a residuum of pain. But the conscious possession of knowledge for reflection, and a storehouse of poetry in the memory to draw upon at will, is the only unalloyed happiness we hav in this world. A certain old man of my acquaintance, who has been a hard-working mechanic all his life, knows by heart most of the dramatic writings ascribed to Mr. William Shakspere, and fully appreciates them for their profound wisdom, as well as their unequaled beauties. A friend visiting him after he had been laid off by old age, found him living in his own house, from which no sheriff could oust him, reciting to himself and commenting on the text of "Julius Cæsar," a production which has done more to giv the English people all their high character for courage, for the sentiment of honor, and all the rest of the natural virtues, than all the sermons that ever were or ever will be preached. He had, during his youth, laid up the stores of intellectual wealth in the book of his memory, which no thief could steal from him, and was now checking them out as he needed them. He cashed his own checks. He was one of the happiest and most independent men alive. Had he been blind as a bat, or deaf as a post, it was no matter, so far as his resources of happiness were concerned. What a contrast between this case and that of thousands of other old men who sit with their toes in the ashes of their hearthstones, whose memories are empty, and whose minds are as incapable of thought as so many mules'. Boys and girls! do your duty while you are young, and lay up the treasures of knowledge for old age.

Early Use of Soap.

More than two thousand years ago the Gauls were combining the ashes of the beech-tree with goat's fat and making soap. When Marius Claudius Marcellus was hastening southward over the Flaminian way, laden with spoils wrested from the hands of Viridomar, the Gallic king lying dead by the banks of the Po, his followers were bringing with them a knowledge of the method of making soap. The awful rain of burning ashes which fell upon Pompeii in 79 buried (with palaces and statues) the humble shop of a soapmaker, and in several other cities of Italy the business had even then a footing. In the eighth century there were many soap manufactories in Italy and Spain, and fifty years later the Phœnicians carried the business into France, and established the first factories in Marsilles. Prior to the invention of soap, fullers' earth was largely used for cleansing purposes, and the juice of certain plants served a similar purpose. The earth was spread upon cloth, stamped in with the feet, and subsequently removed by scouring. It was also used in baths, and as late even as the eighteenth century was employed by the Romans in that way.

Biographical Sketches.

VIII.—SHELLEY.

Percy Bysshe Shelley was born at Field Place on August 4, 1792. His earliest education was received at home with his sisters. At the age of ten he was sent to a school near Brentford, and three years afterward transferred to Eton. He was a shy and sensitiv child, though self-willed and determined. He suffered much from the rough treatment of his schoolmates and the degrading experience with the teachers. The first demonstration of Shelley's hatred and aversion to all authority was his refusal while at Eton to "fag." This fagging consists chiefly of the undergraduates doing the duty of a servant, or servants, for that matter, for their tutor. Sometimes the "faggers" had to smuggle gin and other things for their tutor, which was prohibited in the school. And if they were unlucky enough to get caught they must bear the punishment which rightly belonged to the master.

Shelley flatly refused to do such work at all, and left the school in 1808, and went thence to Oxford. He did not stay there long, however, as he then published a little pamphlet, entitled "A Defense of Atheism," for which he was expelled from college. This so angered his father that he declared that he would hav nothing farther to do with his welfare at all. He was, however, more angered about his son's marriage with an innkeeper's daughter, which took place shostly afterward, than his college scrape. All communication was shut off entirely from the poet and his father now, save a small yearly allowance, which was the poet's right. Shelley's marriage was, however, both infelicitous and tragical. Shelley soon tired of his wife, whose only gift was her beauty. Perhaps they would hav been happy at the end of the chapter had Shelley never met Mary Wolstonecraft Godwin, a distinguished authoress. A separation soon took place between Shelley and his wife, and the latter, taking her children with her, went to her father's house. About three years afterward she drowned herself. Shelley tried to obtain possession of the children, but he was lawfully thwarted by his father-in-law, who claimed that Shelley was unfit for the children because he was an Infidel. But even the sternest moralist could not blame Shelley when they knew how happy Shelley lived with his second wife. There was such intellectual sympathy between the two, and they were reported as having spent as many happy years together as would be only natural.

During the month of March, 1818, Shelley left England—forever, as it proved—for Italy. During the voyage he wrote his famous play of "The Cenci." During a tour through Switzerland he made the acquaintance of Lord Byron. And the two poets, whose taste agreed in so many ways, soon became fast friends, although it was destined not to last long. The winter of 1822 Shelley spent at Pisa, and in the following spring he went farther to Lucci, near the gulf of Spezzia. Like Byron, Shelley was intensely fond of the water, and his fondness for boating amounted almost to a passion, which, however, led to his death. In July 8, 1823, he sailed with his ex-naval friend, Mr. Williams, to welcome his friend Mr. Leigh Hunt to Italy. On the return homeward, during a sudden storm, Shelley was drowned. Some time afterward his body was washed ashore and burned, as the quarantine law demanded, in the presence of Lord Byron and other intimate friends. The ashes were carefully preserved and buried at Rome.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

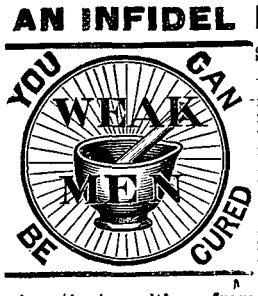
DONALD KENNEDY

Of Roxbury, Mass., Says:



Strange cases cured by my MEDICAL DISCOVERY come to me every day. Here is one of Paralysis—Blindness—and the Grip. Now how does my MEDICAL DISCOVERY cure all these? I don't know, unless it takes hold of the Hidden Poison, that makes all Humor.

VIRGINIA CITY, NEVADA, Sept. 9th, 1891.

Donald Kennedy—Dear Sir: I will state my case to you: About nine years ago I was paralyzed in my left side, and the best doctors gave me no relief for two years, and I was advised to try your DISCOVERY, which did its duty, and in a few months I was restored to health. About four years ago I became blind in my left eye by a spotted cataract. Last March I was taken with La Grippe, and was confined to my bed for three months. At the end of that time, as in the start, then it struck me that your DISCOVERY was the thing for me; so I got a bottle, and before it was half gone I was able to go to my work in the mines. Now in regard to my eyes, as I lost my left eye, and about six months ago my right eye became affected with black spots over the sight as did the left eye—perhaps some twenty of them—but since I have been using your DISCOVERY they all left my right eye but one; and, thank God, the bright light of heaven is once more making its appearance in my left eye. I am wonderfully astonished at it, and thank God and your MEDICAL DISCOVERY.

Yours truly, HANK WHITE.

News of the Week.

THE London Standard publishes a communication in regard to the recent so called aggressiv action of Russia in Pamir, which says: "It is high time for England to unsheathe her sword in Asia. TheRussian tide of conquest which has flowed steadily eastward for fifty years must be sent sweeping back to the Caspian. Russia has boldly pushed on until she now stands at the very outposts of India."

A RUSSIAN dispatch says: "Over thirty millions of human beings are dying of hunger."

ANNIE BESANT praises the American people for "the clear-sighted interest they take in Theosophical questions."

THERE is outcry in radical quarters against the effort of the Barbers' International Union to hav all legislatures prohibit Sunday shaving.

A HEBREW in Syracuse, N. Y., has brought a libel suit against a paper for bringing him into disgrace among his people by calling him a Christian.

ENGLAND is thought by some to be secretly working in the difficulty between Italy and the pope, expecting profit from a quarrel which would lead him to take refuge in Malta.

THE new-made friendship between France and the Vatican is about broken. The bishops exclaim against the govenment order that they shall not go to Italy lest the pilgrim riots be duplicated. The correspondent of the London Times, Mr. Stillman, foretold, on the commencement of the present year, that 1891 would be celebrated by the rupture between the French republic and the holy see. Although the customary derision of a prophecy was not wanting, late events hav done much toward the fulfillment of this correspondent's forebodings for the future. Everything seems to tend toward the separation of the Vatican and the Elysee. A dispatch from France says: "The circulaire praying the bishops to abstain from visiting their chief in prison, and the prosecution of the archbishop of Aix, was a beginning of the end perhaps, for has not the French parliament now proposed the separation of church and state?"

MEXICO is trying to keep the Central American republics from confederating. Jealousy of Guatemala and fear of that state as a powerful and dangerous neighbor are the cause.

"HE is a fine-looking fellow," said an Austrian lady not long ago, as she looked at his highness the Archduke Franz Ferdinand in his carriage. Her remark reached the ear of the public prosecutor, who, deeming the word "fellow" disrespectful, ordered her arrest, and she was sentenced to six months' imprisonment. The lady was rich enough to appeal to the supreme court in Vienna, which ordered her release.

ON the Italian king's proposal to make the religious marriage ceremony null, Catholics say: "How will Umberto receive in future those ladies whose marriage he has denounced as criminal? Those whom he has insulted on the most delicate question involving social and family relations? How will the crowned heads of Europe bear the stigma? Will Germany and Austria, and even the Turk, resent it? Probably not; the interests of the Triple Alliance are paramount."

ON the proposal to distribute aid for starving Russians through the British and Foreign Bible Society, a good judge says: "The proposal is crassly stupid. Agents of the Bible Society are beings accursed in the eyes of the Russian government and of the all-powerful orthodox church. Their proselytizing labors are distinctly illegal and they are only allowed to remain in the country on sufferance. All their movements would be watched and their schemes frustrated."

THERE is much reason to suppose there will be a famin in Russia next year also. The autumn wheat has been seriously injured by the rain, and it is very probable that the spring crops in many of the eastern governments will turn out no better than they did this year. The outlook in holy Russia is very gloomy. Nihilist agents are working activly to persuade the peasants that the czar can and ought to supply them with food. The large factories at Lodsi are stopping work for want of orders, leaving the operativs in a destitute condition.

THE LORD TELLETH A FISH STORY THAT KNOCKETH THE CONCEIT OUT OF JOB.—(See Job xli and xlii, 6.)

Gems of Thought.

THERE is no prophecy in the Old Testament foretelling the coming of Jesus Christ. There is not one word in the Old Testament referring to him in any way—not one word. The only way to prove this is to take your Bible, and wherever you find these words: "That it might be fulfilled," and "was spoken," turn to the Old Testament and find what was written, and you will see that it had not the slightest possible reference to the thing recounted in the New Testament—not the slightest.—Robt. G. Ingersoll.

IF there be any ill in the universe from mere chance, then a designing principle or mind, whether good or bad, cannot be the cause of all things; and consequently, if there be supposed a designing principle, who is the cause only of good, but cannot prevent the ill which happens from chance, or from a contrary ill design, then there can be supposed in reality no such thing as a superior, good design, or mind, other than what is impotent and defectiv; for not to correct or totally exclude that ill of chance, or of a contrary ill design, must proceed either from impotency or ill-will.—D'Holbach.

IT often happened, that the specific gravity of epileptics, whose fibers and muscles withered away, was lighter than water, and that they floated when put into it. A miracle! was instantly exclaimed. It was pronounced that such a person must be a demoniac or a sorcerer; and holy water or the executioner was immediately sent for. It was an unquestionable proof that either the demon had become master of the body of the floating person, or that the latter had voluntarily delivered himself over to the demon. On the first supposition the person was exorcised, on the second he was burnt. Thus hav we been reasoning and acting for a period of fifteen or sixteen hundred years, and yet we hav the effrontery to laugh at the Caffres!—Voltaire.

WHERE the press is free and every man able to read, all is safe.—Thomas Jefferson.

IT is a source of great satisfaction to me that that distinguished littérateur, the Ghost—usually yclept the Holy Ghost, for some reason I hav been unable to make out—has quite given up the literary profession. Nobody else would hav had any chance against him. He has written one book only, or rather a series of small tracts tacked together by nothing else but the binding. And, O Jerusalem, what a sale the work has! The Ghost's principal publishers in London are in Queen Victoria street, and his book goes off in hundreds of thousands of tons annually. Its sale seems to be, in great part, attributable to the fact that the work is written by the King of Heaven and dedicated to the King of England. All books proceeding from royal pens are, in character, quite exceptional, from the olden royal volume that treats of Abraham down to the recent volume that immortalizes Brown. Any ordinary mortal would hav supposed that the Ghost would hav found his publisher in Holywell street; but the Ghost is no ordinary mortal. He had the effrontery to offer his book in a far other locality; and effrontery was rewarded with its frequent concomitant, success. The profits out of his book alone must render the Ghost the wealthiest member of the Trinity. Some optimists, including myself, are sanguin that he may yet buy out the other members of the firm. Much might reasonably be expected from this anticipated transaction. The Father's character is exceedingly questionable; the Son, to put it mildly, is generally suspected to be somewhat queer in the upper story; while the Ghost has many negativ merits. True, he got into some sort of scrape over a girl in Palestine; but generous minds will not make too much of this; and all else that is known of him is that he once transformed himself into a pigeon, and that he once, on a pentecostal occasion, took the form of "cloven tongues as of fire." Those who hav observed a pile of Paysandu tongues in a shop window can easily gather what the Ghost is like by fancying each tongue to be of red-hot iron, and cloven—that is, split, as boys split a magpie's tongue with a sixpence to make it speak.—Saladin in God and His Book.

THE pope complains of being forced by antipapal violence in Rome to remain imprisoned in the Vatican.

LAWS against Sunday work for barbers are in force in Tennessee, Minnesota, Colorado, Indiana, Ohio, and Michigan.

A GIRL in Dexter, Me., possesses a faculty which mystifies her friends. When blindfolded and provided with a photograph she can describe the person or object portrayed in the picture, and she will also describe the objects in any picture or print after merely running her finger-tips over the surface.

AN extensiv find of rich deposits of aluminum was made last week in the San Mateo mountains, about forty miles west of Albuquerque. Three miners brought to the latter place samples of a material they had found and with the nature of which they were unacquainted. It was assayed in Denver, and found to contain twenty-five per cent of aluminum. The men say the metal exists in great abundance.

THE Colorado Graphic says: "Stop the street-cars on Sunday and see how quickly the threadbare members of the Law and Order League who cannot afford the luxury of a horse and carriage will interpose in their own behalf." Certainly they would: the persons who are so ready to dictate to others as to how they shall spend Sunday do not expect to be restricted in the least in their own actions. If a law were passed that in any way restricted their movements on any day, it would be promptly denounced as an unwarranted interference with their sacred rights. Indeed, they are so bigoted and so wrapped up in self that they think all the world should do on Sunday just as they say; and they cannot be happy until they hav it in their power to compel this very thing.

ONCE upon a time, says the Sun, when a man had a narrow escape from threatened calamity, he showed his gratitude to providence by making a pilgrimage, by giving alms to the poor or gifts to the church. But times hav changed. Leonard Patterson, a young man of Bangor, Me., had a very narrow escape from death recently. An immense safe fell on him, but for some reason he escaped with but slight injuries. He announces in the newspapers that "in honor of his miraculous escape" he "will giv a dance in Union Hall" one evening this week.

THE horror of the great Russian famin is all implied in these few words of Count Tolstoi in his public letter of November 1st: "In out-of-the-way death-stricken localities, such as the one from which I write (the Dankov district), there is no rye for sale. Flour cannot be bought for money. And this is not an exceptional phenomenon; it is of constant occurrence everywhere." And yet, while the Russian government is distributing alms with one hand to the peasants, with the other armed with a knout it exacts taxes from the same starving wretches.

FEW of the Protestant churches in Maine can hold their flocks without offering liberal feeds on all possible occasions, and even then the faithful complain of the scarcity of oysters and criticise the cooking. All of the new churches hav kitchens, and as winter approaches the local newspapers hav announcements of oyster suppers, bean suppers, antique suppers, New England suppers, coffee suppers, and pink and lemon teas. The multiplication of loaves and fishes would hav to be carried to the last extreme to satisfy all of those who find piety in provender.

ONE of the latest religious frauds was founded in 1884 by the Abbé Buguet, of Montligeon, France. It is an association to "aid the forsaken souls in purgatory—those for whom no one else was praying and who had no hope of coming to the end of their sufferings until they had themselvs satisfied the justice of God." Every month the association has three thousand masses said for its object. Its members contribute one half-penny yearly to its funds, and they share in all its merits and may gain special indulgences with which it has been endowed.

THE Sun thus pointedly comments on the action of the barbers' convention at Grand Rapids, Mich.: "Why should the Barbers' International Union ask the state legislatures to enact laws prohibiting all the barbers of the United States plying their razors on Sunday? There is no law in any state requiring barbers to engage in Sunday shaving. Every barber in the country is at liberty to refuse to shave anybody, or trim anybody's beard, or cut anybody's locks on Sunday. Any barber has the right to close and bar his shop every Sunday of the year. The International Barbers' Union had better let the legislatures of the states attend to public affairs while its members regulate their own business. The proposed legislation would not reach the root of the matter. What the legislatures must do, if they would giv genuin relief to the barber, is to pass prohibitory laws or constitutional amendments forbidding beards to grow on Sunday."

A WRITER in the London Pall Mall Gazette says that he and others fathomed the secret of the wonderful feats of Lulu Hurst, the original Georgia Wonder, during her first performances, and after she had retired from the stage he learned the facts from the lips of Miss Hurst herself. She simply made the investigators do all the work. When she wanted to lift a chair on which a heavy man was seated, she put her palms to the sides of the back and tilted it forward. The person seated in it involuntarily grasped the side rungs or the seat, and to save himself from falling raised the chair himself, his toes never leaving the ground. The whole thing was done so quickly that it required a quick eye not to be deceived. The thud with which the chair came to the floor when the forward pressure was relaxed helped the illusion. When the investigator grasped the umbrella handle, and was requested to hold it very firmly, he unconsciously braced himself so that his center of gravity was easily disturbed, and pushed hard in a direction oppposit to that in which he judged the umbrella would move. A slight pressure on the part of the Georgia Wonder acted as a lure, and when this pressure ceased a strong man would involuntarily run forward in the direction in which he was pressing. All her tricks were simply the application of power in such a fashion as to deceive the onlooker into the belief that it was being exerted in an exactly contrary direction.

Christianity at the Bar of History.

It is sometimes contended that the truth of Christianity is demonstrated by the fact of its wonderful history. No religion, it is alleged, has succeeded in accomplishing so much for human well-being; in other words, no religion has contributed so largely toward the happiness and progress of mankind. No religion, it is claimed, has produced such benefi cial effects upon the nature of its believers and supporters as the religion of Christ. To test the value of these statements, it is necessary that we should turn over some of the pages of early ecclesiastical history and see what these pages reveal. And what shall we find? Instead of Christianity being all that is pure and noble and good, unhappily for humanity we find that its early history was anything but cred itable to its upholders; and, moreover, that it was a corrupt and persecuting religion, which in many cases, so far from elevating its early believers, only converted them into the willing and wicked instruments of its tyranny. Its bishops, clergy, and missionaries were low-minded, ignorant, and superstitious, and manifested in their actions some of the worst vices of men.

In the first century after the alleged death of Jesus the conduct of Christians was at its best; they behaved with commendable heroism and self-restraint; but as soon as Christianity got power and began to spread throughout the Roman empire, Christianity began to display a tyrannical and persecuting spirit which grew and grew until it culminated in what are now known as the "Dark Ages of Christianity"—one of the saddest and most terrible pages in the history of the world.

It is sometimes said that the base and brutal men of these ages, the men who inspired all kinds of cruelty, who deluged the earth with human blood, who enslaved the bodies and minds of millions of people—that these men could not hav been Christians.

But during the early centuries of the Christian church the persecutors were representativ men; they were the men in authority; and if it is said that they were not Christians, the obvious retort is, Where were the Christians during those ages? And if the time of Constantine down to the Reformation was marked by vice and corruption, surely the impartial student of history may question the soundness of the tree which bore such bad fruit.

If Christianity failed to influence its believers for good from the fourth to the sixteenth century, surely we may attribute the virtue of Christians since that date to some other and more powerful agency?

But let us turn over the pages of history and examin the evidence.

We find in the third century Christianity, having extended its influence and power to Rome, began to assume importance as a political factor, which required to be counted upon and taken into account by those who sought to rule the destinies of the Roman empire.

Remember this fact: A contest took place between various Roman emperors with a view, on the one hand, of establishing it as the state religion, and, on the other, of extirpating it altogether; but the Christians ultimately succeeded in gaining Constantine over to their side, and in A.D. 314 an edict was issued from Milan from Constantine and Licinius, which granted "to the Christians, and to all, the free choice to follow that mode of worship which they may wish; that no freedom at all shall be refused to Christians to follow or to keep their observances or worship; but that to each one power be granted to devote his mind to the worship which he may think adapted to himself" (Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, page 431). Soon, however, Licinius showed his former hostility to Christianity and renewed the war against Constantine, who thereupon embraced the Christian religion, and, with the support and sympathy of Christians, succeeded in defeating Licinius and became emperor in his stead.

With Constantine at the head of the empire, Christianity became the state religion, and under his reign all sorts of cruelties were perpetrated, and "future tyrants," as Gibbon says, "were encouraged to believe that the innocent blood which they might shed in a long reign would instantly be washed away in the waters of regeneration" (Gibbon, Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, page 472).

During the third and fourth centuries the wealth of the church increased immensely, and many of the chief dignitaries lived in great pomp and style; some, of course, manifested the best spirit of piety, and their conduct was worthy of admiration; but for the most part the bishops and clergy were characterized by their arrogance, vanity, and ambition, and cared little for the well-being of those over whom they had control. The example of the bishops was imitated by the presbyters and others in subordinate positions, and this led to indolence on the one hand and vice on the other.

During the third century, too, a great scandal was caused by many priests, who, pretending to liv lives of celibacy—which in all ages of ignorance has appeared to the superstitious to be purer than married life—were really living in wanton immorality. According to Gibbon, many who had resolved to adhere to celibacy "formed connections with those women who had made vows to perpetual chastity; and it was an ordinary thing for an ecclesiastic to admit one of these fair saints to the participation of his bed, but still under the most solemn declarations that nothing passed in this commerce that was contrary to the rules of chastity and virtue" (Gibbon's Decline, page 73).

It must be remembered that in the first century of the Christian era nothing whatever is known of the existence of a Christian church. No doubt a number of vain persons set themselvs up as teachers or oracles. Indeed, we hav only to refer to the New Testament to find that a number of persons went about proclaiming themselvs to be "Christ," and a number of "false teachers" appear to hav found it an easy matter to get a large following.

In this century Knosticism, which is a compound made up of Christianity and Oriental philosophy, prevailed to a very large extent, and caused a good deal of discussion, being, as it was, diametrically opposed to many of the most important doctrins of the "orthodox" portion of the community.

There was also another important division among the Christians: a division between Jewish and gentile Christians. The former developed into what were called "Ebionites" and "Nazarenes;" the others called themselvs the true Christians. The more the doctrins of Christianity were discussed the greater became the difference of opinion, and so Christianity, in a very early period of its growth, found its believers divided into a multitude of sects.

In the early portion of the third century there appeared a remarkable man named Manes or Manichæus, a Persian magus. He propagated a Christianity of his own. Like many other religious teachers, he held that man's body was evil; that man could neither think nor do a good thing of himself; that "his thoughts were evil continually;" and that only by mortifying the flesh could he hope to get supreme happiness. He also taught that the highest life was only to be reached by those who abstained from intoxicating drink, abstained from flesh, fish, eggs, and milk, and who lived a life of the strictest celibacy.

They were to liv on the simplest of foods and deny themselvs everything pertaining to luxury. Sects, such as the Novatians and others, then arose and before the end of the third century a multitude of divisions existed among the Christians, and learned controversies raged as to the person of the godhead, which led to quarrels and persecutions of a bitter and malignant character.

In the fourth century (under Constantine) the first great council at Nice was summoned, and by a large vote decided that "Christ was of the same substance as the father," and condemned the heresies of Arius.

Constantine having now gained undisputed authority over the whole Christian community, he soon demonstrated that the religion of the "meek and lowly Jesus" in his hands was not altogether a doctrin of "peace and good will to mankind," but that he was capable of using in his service the sword without mercy or remorse to sustain his position in the Roman world. By this means thousands were trepanned into a quiet acquiescence in Christianity.

Gibbon says: "The hopes of wealth and honors, the example of an emperor, his exhortations, his irresistible smiles, diffused conviction among the venal and obsequious crowds which usually fill the apartments of a palace. The cities which signalized a forward zeal by the voluntary destruction of their temples, were distinguished by municipal privileges and rewarded with popular donativs; and the new capital of the East gloried in the singular advantage that Constantinople was never profaned by the worship of idols. As the lower ranks of society are governed by imitation, the conversion of those who possessed any eminence of birth, of power, or of riches, was soon followed by dependent multitudes. The salvation of the common people was purchased at an easy rate, if it be true that in one year twelv thousand men were baptized at Rome, besides a proportionate number of women and children, and that a white garment, with twenty pieces of gold, had been promised by the emperor to every convert" (Gibbon's Decline and Fall, vol. ii, pp. 472, 473).

The same high authority tells us that the sons of Constantine were veritable chips of the old block, and followed the same course of action as their father, "continuing to abrogate and efface the ancient superstitions of the Romans and other idolatrous nations, and to accelerate the progress of the Christian religion throughout the empire. This zeal was no doubt laudable; its end was excellent; but in the means used to accomplish it there were many things worthy of blame" (Ibid., p. 88).

In the year A.D. 360 Julian succeeded to a part of the empire; though educated as a Christian he reverted to philosophical paganism, evidently failing to believe in the teachings of Christianity. This emperor, who gained sole authority over the Roman empire in the year 361, showed his dislike of Christianity in so marked a degree in his writings and in his conduct that his Christian opponents designated him "Julian the Apostate." Yet, despite all, Julian displayed a higher degree of fairness than his predecessors, and by decree gave perfect equality to all creeds in the empire.

After Julian came a long line of Christian emperors, and it is natural that, under their rule, Christianity made rapid progress, many, no doubt, professing the faith from fear of the consequences. Mosheim says that very disreputable methods were adopted in order to induce people to embrace Christianity, fear, fraud, forgery, and force being among them. His words are: "The endless frauds of those odious impostors, who were so far destitute of all principles as to enrich themselvs by the ignorance and errors of the people. Rumors were artfully spread abroad of prodigies and miracles to be seen in certain places (a trick often practiced by the heathen priests), and the design of these reports was to draw the populace in multitudes to these places and to impose upon their credulity. . . . Nor was this all; certain tombs were falsely given out for the sepulchers of saints and confessors. The list of the saints was augmented by fictitious names, and even robbers were converted into martyrs. . . . A whole volume would be requisit to contain an enumeration of the various frauds which artful knaves practiced with success to delude the ignorant, when true religion was almost entirely superseded by horrid superstition" (Ecclesiastical History, p 98) The bishops wrangled respecting their positions and the extent of their jurisdictions, and trampled the rights of the people under their feet; they also lived extravagantly, and in their conduct were arrogant and overbearing toward one another.

In this age the first heretic of whom we hav any record was put to death in Rome. Theodosius, one of the worst emperors, was the bitterest of all the persecutors of heretics, and in his reign issued no less then fifteen edicts against the heretics; "heretical teachers were exposed to the heavy penalties of exile and confiscation if they presumed to preach the doctrin or practice the rites of their accursed sects. Their meetings were proscribed and the ground or building forfeited to the imperial domain." And Gibbon adds: "The sectaries were gradually disqualified for the possession of honorable or lucrativ employments; and Theodosius was satisfied with his own justice, when he decreed that as the Eunonians distinguished the nature of the son from the father, they should be incapable of making their wills, or of receiving any advantages from testamentary donations" (Decline and Fall, vol. iii, pp. 412, 413).

Draper, in a few terse sentences, sums up the effect of Constantine's reign by affirming that it "marks the epoch of the transformation of Christianity from a religion into a political system; and though, in one sense, that system was degraded into an idolatry, in another it had risen into a development of the old Greek mythology. The maxim holds good in the social as well as in the mechanical world that when two bodies strike the form of both is changed. Paganism was modified by Christianity, Christianity by paganism" (Conflict Between Science and Religion, p. 52).

Up to the end of the fourth century we find that the clergy were profligate; that heresy was put down by the strong arm of the law; that heretics were persecuted and ill-treated, and that Christianity, having become a powerful political force, waged incessant war against all other forces for supremacy.

ARTHUR B. MOSS.

English Notes.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKERS: This is a funny world! Sometimes that fact is brought home to us in roundabout ways, but I don't remember to hav had so quaint an illustration of it as one I had to-night over a cup of tea. My companion was a youth of nineteen, not overburdened with wits, yet sharp enough in many things. Apparently hopelessly incompetent for anything else, he was gladly pounced upon by his ecclesiastical superiors to train the young in his local Sabbath-school. His business was to be there betimes each Sunday, and should a teacher be absent, to occupy the vacant chair. Last Sunday the third class fell to his lot. Lads of nine or ten years of age were his disciples, so that his intelligence was taxed to the utmost. With what result? The teacher was dilating on the efficacy of prayer (which, by the way, he called the "effasy" of prayer), and one little fellow wanted to know what "effasy" meant. Our young professor was unequal to the occasion and decided to leave the knotty point to a tract he had in his pocket, which he read to the class. That tract sealed his fate as a teacher, for the superintendent happened to pass and looked at the pamphlet. Imagin his horror when he saw the title-page, "The Folly of Prayer," by G. W. Foote. Very few words sufficed to explain to the teacher that his services were henceforth dispensed with; that they would rather go without a teacher than trouble him any more; and that they had decided to a hav a properly qualified teacher for the future. Thus is Secularism decaying in England; the wonder to the Christians is how the Secularists manage to saturate their most cherished lambs with their diabolical teachings. Perhaps they will pray to God the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost for the necessary information. If that fail they can come to us and we will gladly tell them.

Some Christians get quite frantic over our work. Last Sunday afternoon at Tottenham I was lecturing to a large audience on "St. Paul the Apostle." A miserable band of Christians held a few devotees enthralled close by. Soon they drifted one by one to my side to hear the good news of Secularism. The preacher's heart sank within him and he turned toward me, shouting at the top of his voice that I was leading them all down to the lowest depths of damnation. The crowd roared and so did the preacher. A second evangelist joined the chorus and the gesticulations became wild in the extreme and an immense concourse assembled. At last a friendly policeman interfered as they began to close upon the chair from which I was speaking; for it was obvious that the hitherto amicable preachers had lost their heads entirely in the frenzied efforts to save their poor lost brothers' souls from an eternal hell; only the brothers stuck to me and we reaped quite a decent collection of pennies at the close.

Now again we are asked whether we really make any impression by our outdoor lectures, or whether we merely amuse the idlers. Well, to be candid, I'm not quite sure of the effect, save that it must be better for men to be listening to something educational than for them to be chatting vulgarities or worse. But on Sunday morning, after we had been holding a meeting on the famous Clerkenwell green (where never a blade of grass grows and all is cobblestones) in support of Robert Forder, I noticed that the goodly audience who supported us flocked as one man to the Social Democratic Federation orator as soon as we were through; and it looked remarkably like they had honored us and voted as we asked for lack of other occupation on that Sunday morning. Be that as it may, it is a cause for congratulation that we are able to get hold of such men, and if they cannot enter very heartily into what they hear we can at least hope that some of it may stick and help them to be better parents and citizens. I believe it does; the shaking of hands, the greed for literature, the desire to hear more on some subjects, cannot all be vain; and the more I struggle on in this outdoor missionary work amongst the ignorant and thoughtless the more I am convinced that we are doing what we can to improve the masses, and that when our work is done and we retire or die we shall leave the world better for our lives and personal sacrifices.

On Thursday night Mr. Robert Forder had a very handsome illuminated testimonial presented to him in recognition of his excellent and faithful services rendered as secretary of the National Secular Society. The occasion was made one of singing and dancing at the Hall of Science, London; and it is scarcely necessary to add that many of the leading Secularists joined their less known colleagues in the mirth. Mr. Forder, as lion of the evening, was in great request. Another, rarely seen among us now, though a veteran in the cause, was Mr. John Austin, who designed and executed the artistic gift to Mr. Forder. The same artist worked the testimonial given years ago, in the same hall, to D. M. Bennett. Perhaps there was another reason why Mr. Forder proved so interesting to all. During that Thursday, from 8 A.M. till 8 P.M., the voters of the Finsbury Division had been recording their votes for and against our worthy friend. All was suspense, and all hoped rather than believed that he had won his seat on the London School Board. What a pity it seemed that the result of the election could not be known right then to giv further emphasis to the gift! Well, perhaps it was best unknown, for Forder failed to score. With 8,943 votes in his favor, he was still 137 behind the last of the successful candidates. For all that, the poll was better than had been hoped for. It was fondly believed that 6,000 would carry a seat if he could only get them; he succeeded in getting half as many more, and was over 2,000 ahead of the next comer and he a popular clergyman.

I wonder what our Wesleyan Methodist friends are up to now. John Wesley would not know himself amongst them, and would probably be voted a heretic. Anyhow, several of the London chapels (they call them "churches" now) are getting quite ritualistic. I could go to half a dozen well on the road to Rome; and now I read with startled eyeballs that the world-known City Road chapel which Wesley built, and which is now to be known as John Wesley's chapel, has an altar raised on two white marble steps, with fittings to match. I once went into a Wesleyan chapel just outside of London and found a raised chancel, sweet altar up ever so many steps from the floor, perfectly Catholic designs in the apse, and two brass gas brackets, tall and dignified, shaped like the candlesticks so dear to Catholic hearts, with gas-jets where one expected tallow candles. Hugh Price Hughes, the discoverer of the Atheistic shoemaker, has some poor imitations of Sisters of Mercy in the neighborhood of Oxford street, and many of the ministers hav all the outward appearance of real clergymen. All this is of importance to us only in so far as it points to the reunion of Christendom in the direction of Rome, and to the coming struggle in which Secularists will hav to play so prominent and painful a part. Do let us set to work earnestly for this struggle for truth!

Another interesting fact is that the church people are beginning to find that average people do not go to church at all nowadays. Naturally they ask why. Nobody knows, unless it is that religion has less hold on the people's mind than formerly. This the Christians are slow to admit Liverpool, with half a million of souls, has just canvassed the churches on a Sunday morning, and the good bodies who undertook the work hav been chagrined to find the results much below their expectations. Next they tried the evening services, for good Protestants do not trouble their God much till after tea time, and put in a church on Sundays much as they put in a theater or dance on week days. The total who went to church on that given Sunday evening was 164 610, or about one-quarter of the inhabitants of that city! If the Liverpool Secularists were livelier than they are, there certainly ought to be more than one small branch; do you not think so?

Ah, well! Secularism is forging ahead in England; and if we do not rake all our converts into the National Secular Society, it is comforting to feel that we are turning the nation into a land of Secularists pure and simple. SAM STANDRING.

Some Other Economic Opinions.

In reply to an article on "Some Economic Opinions," which appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 21st, I would like to state that a short experience in farming in the West will correct some views therein expressed.

Whether or not you can afford to sell corn in bulk or in the form of pork, beef, or horses, depends on the relativ price of corn, and pork, beef, and horses; also the regularity with which a crop can be raised. And farmers, as a usual thing, understand this quite as well as anybody else. In this vicinity corn is at present selling for forty cents per bushel, and hogs are worth from $2 85 to $3 per one hundred pounds. The raw material in a bushel of corn is not worth one-tenth of a mill (and for that matter raw material is worth nothing without labor applied to it), and the difference between one tenth of a mill and forty cents is made by labor and ingenuity; and so why would it not be a good thing to giv a bounty for every bushel of corn or wheat raised in the United States? It strikes me that the resistance to man offered by nature is sufficient to develop his brain, and to add artificial difficulties is worse than superfluous.

To say that a ton of steel rails manufactured in the United States makes this country's account to read, "The United States credit by one ton of steel rails, $30; the United States credit by cash for one ton of steel rails, $30," is not unlike the story of feeding thousands on a few loaves and small fishes, and having more left than when they commenced. In the United States during the year 1880. the account must hav stood, "Credit $5 000 000 000 worth of produce, $5 000 000,000, plus $5 000,000,000, the selling price," which is absurd. Suppose, for simplicity, a ton of steel rails is sold for seventy-five bushels of corn; in opening up the account the writer of the article I am criticising would experience the same difficulty that they will at the resurrection in case some cannibal sinner has swallowed a missionary saint.

The general trade of a single country is not carried on by exchanging the goods of the producer for the money of the consumer, but by bartering the goods of one for the goods of the other; and money acts only as a clearing-house in settling balances. Much the same transaction takes place in the trade between foreign countries, with this exception, instead of having any international money with which to settle accounts, they make use of a commodity which is divisible, and contains great commercial value in small bulk, and for which there is a ready and steady market. This commodity is usually gold or silver. Diamonds would do just as well were they divisible without detriment.

It is rather laughable to hear men talk about an "American system" and an "American policy." It is much nearer the historical truth to speak of a protectiv system as an English policy; which, like some of her old fashioned machinery, she has shipped and sold here, because in the markets of the world it was long out of date.

The importers are not the only persons demanding free trade. Free traders are mostly men who are obliged to sell their products in the markets of the world and buy the supplies they consume in raising the products they sell in open markets, in the high-priced protected markets at home.

The agricultural laborer of this country is as intelligent as any in the world. How can he compete on even terms with the Russian wheat-raiser when his own countrymen charge him nearly twice as much for the machinery they sell him, as they do his rivals for the machinery they sell them! And yet they talk of protecting the American laborer! Abraham protected his son Ishmael in just the same way.

The other class of men among free traders is those who hav made the subject their particular study; for I know of scarcely a reputable writer on political economy (who has no ax to grind) but who is a free trader. It is true political economists are called theorists, visionaries, and such names, but if calling names would kill a man some of our best men would hav been dead long ago. The best way to kill off a philosopher is to successfully refute his philosophy. It will hardly do to say your theory is all right but you cannot put it in practice, for theory is simply the classification of facts put in concise language.

It is most strange language to say that if there were free trade importers would hav nothing to do, and that their customers would be impoverished; for the opposit, protection, would dismiss importers to innocuous desuetude, and how paying less for sugar would impoverish the consumers thereof is a mystery.

If money is not created by law I am at a loss to know how it is created. If you were to place a $20 gold piece on an anvil and deface the superscription, though in quality and quantity it were not one whit less, its money value is gone. Its tender will no longer pay a debt of $20. If money is not created by law, then weights and measures are not created by law, which we know to be the case. The value of a dollar is its compulsory debt-paying quality, and Congress can and does fix it. Of course it is beyond the power of Congress to fix the purchasing power of money, for that would be setting a price on a man's goods, a price at which he is compelled to part with them. I do not believe in light money, or cheap money, or poor money; but in discussing the money question it is desirable to state what we mean by the terms "light," "cheap," and "poor."

To speak of a dollar's worth of silver in a silver dollar without stating a unit of measure, is purest nonsense, and to advocate the use of silver as money because it is produced in the United States would apply to wheat and corn. It is said that next year Mexico will equal this country in its product of silver.

To sum up all in a few words, value is an ideal quality and is regulated by the owner or the one who desires a thing. (This has been decided by the Supreme Court.) And consequently the value of anything depends on the extent to which men think it ministers to their happiness. These things are termed wealth, and money is wealth only to the extent that it ministers to the happiness of mankind. This it does by effecting an exchange or settling a debt. If a man has got any doubt about the meaning of a dollar he can settle that doubt by attempting to make one and to purchase with it. The United States defines its position quite definitly on that point.

As a matter of fact there is no such thing as gold money or silver money; but there is such a thing as United States money and British money made of gold, silver, and other metals. And since 1856 or 1857 the value of foreign coins in this country is 0.

Taking into consideration the condition of things in this country—viz, the enhanced prices resulting from a tariff—the extra amount of money required by the extensiv division of labor and exchanges—the addition to our wealth of more than a billion and a half per year, with the infinitesimally small ratio of increase in our money—taking these things into consideration I am free to say the money of the United States is working the hardest of any in the world.

Freethought is a good thing, but to giv to a man a Freethought tract with one hand and with the other to assist in impoverishing him, will not aid the cause to any appreciable extent. I suppose this at least to be the case. So to be candid with you, Mr. Editor, I do not think Mr. Ingersoll ever wrote the above-mentioned article, for so grand a man would not make such grand mistakes.

A Christmas or New Year's Present.

The "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book" in cloth binding ($2 50) is one of the best Christmas or New Year's presents a Liberal can make to a friend. Christmas is a pagan festival and New Year's is only a mark of time, but the Text-Book is a thing of beauty and a joy forever, and will help to rationalize the festival and make your friend forget the flight of years.

A New Society of Freethought.

I hav been urged to undertake the establishment of a new Liberal and independent society for the propagation of Freethought and to set forth the grounds upon which I think such a society ought to rest. I hav not yet consented to commit myself to the task; for the problem that presents itself is truly a formidable one. A meeting is called (elsewhere announced) for the launching of such a movement. If at that meeting the material foundations for the same are successfully laid, then I will plunge into the allotted labors with all my ability; but if at that meeting the experiment seems futil and worthless and no assurances of success seem forthcoming then my connection with the affair ceases. I speak plainly now, that I may not afterward be accused of halting or inconsistency.

For the society thus founded I should hope to enunciate such principles as would afford a common platform for the coalescence and fraternization of the various schools of reform, secular and religious.

I am well aware of the perils of such an undertaking. Nevertheless, I believe certain common principles can be declared upon which all schools will be willing to unite. I will here state a few of the principles upon which I believe we can coalesce and cooperate.

1. The absolute and unqualified separation between church and state.

2. The abrogation of all Sunday, sumptuary, and religious laws.

3, The unqualified non-censorship of the public press.

4. The abrogation of the authority of the church in the morals of the individual and the nation. Common sense, the noblest instinct of the race, is a safer vigilance committee than a band of preachers nurtured in the effete wisdom of the medievalists.

5. The disuse of the Bible and theological or religious hymns in any sacred or devotional sense in the curriculum of education pursued in the public schools.

6. The abrogation of all laws exempting from taxation available church property, whereby millions of dollars are yearly extorted by indirection from the hard-earned coins of the unchurched masses, for the gratification of the luxurious patricians who constitute the religious aristocracy of Christendom.

7. Eternal vigilance against every overt or surreptitious attempt to weave into the declarations of our national Constitution any religious vestment or theological insinuation.

8 The abrogation of all laws which are unjustly prejudicial to the interests of the working classes.

9. The development of such practical schemes for the education of the unfortunate and the dignified relief of their crying wants as shall be compatible with good sense and the ameliorating environments of the age. (Preach down all wrong into the ears of those who are its beneficiaries; but while doing so alleviate the wants and pains of those who are its unpropitious victims!)

10. The gradual modification of the present social order and economic situation, from better to better, step by step, and persistent education along the line until the attainment of the distant era of peace when the rights and liberties of the individual shall be recognized as harmonious and coördinate with the rights and liberties of the collectiv body.

11. Absolute and untrammeled freedom of thought. Energetic and defiant protests against all bigotry and intellectual narrowness, whether they come in the frock of the priest or in the livery of the libertarian. Whatever our biases or preconceptions, we shall never be loath to accept that as truth to-day which yesterday we regarded as error, if the facts shall compel us to such conclusions, believing with Emerson that "consistency is the hobgoblin of little minds."

Why should not a great popular movement based upon such purely humanitarian principles and wholly devoid of theological bias or religious supernaturalism succeed in this age?

In spite of the atrocities and barbarities of her career, in spite of her bloodguiltiness and undisguised repudiation of the simplicity of her so-called savior's teachings, the church of Christ has developed from a mere handful of men till to-day she controls the entire world.

Why?

Because she has behind her some mysterious and undiscernible force which she blandly calls God, and assumes that the hierarchies of heaven are subject to her beck?

Not at all.

Simply because, in spite of her vapid supernaturalism and diaphanous hypocrisy, she has touched the chords of humanity and played upon the sympathies of the race. She has aggregated, organized, and utilized the human and social forces which pervade the race, and holding these as in a leash has guided the world whithersoever she chose to lead it.

Here, then, is the keynote of success for all purely natural and humanitarian movements. Devoid of the thin gauze of the supernatural and the false hope of post mortem redemption, such a movement must plainly and proudly manifest to the age that potent force which, utilized by the race, will result in its uplifting and amelioration.

Liberalism has too often failed because founded upon negation. Negation is a vacuum. The human mind cannot feed upon a vacuum. Liberalism must assert and affirm, if it hopes to abide. Liberalism has too often foundered mid-sea upon the rock of disputation, beating the empty air with the fisticuffs of vain discussion. Liberalism must seize the forces that conserve, coalesce, and fraternize the race, if she hopes to escape disaster. Liberalism must do as well as damn; must rear as well as ruin! Merely to dissipate the clouds will not suffice unless thereby the sunlit heavens are revealed. Therefore the platform upon which Liberals build should be free as the air, broad as the world, and clear as the daylight. Let every problem be discussed, every thought analyzed, every philosophy penetrated. Let the mind be free to soar whithersoever it will in search of intellectual food and the pabulum of wisdom.

But let not Liberalism forget the heart of man. The soul of sensibilities is the fathomless reservoir out of which must pour the flood of human consolation and human amelioration. Weak is the heart and strong is the head; still ever is the heart the leader and the head the laggard.

Methodism succeeded despite her fatuous theology and her medieval vestments, because she discerned this secret of the race and based her religious enthusiasm upon the sympathies and necessities of the human heart. The yearnings of the race are not anachronisms or anomalies, to be shattered by the iconoclast's club; they are potencies and prophecies, which intelligently nurtured become the restorers and saviors of mankind.

The New Liberalism, the Liberalism which is to sweep the age, and establish the Church of Freedom or Church of Truth, is the Liberalism which, building upon the intellectual triumphs of the past, shall unite the proud philosophy of the age with the plodding practicalities of life—shall hitch stars to common cart-wheels and cause comets to course the paths of earth.

Defying the dead past and the moribund present with all their biases and hypocrisies, their foibles and fallacies, the New Liberalism lifts on high the torch of knowledge for all the world, that men may walk wisely, that the race may be knit together in common brotherhood, and that the love of truth may be the universal genius guiding the human kind amid the uncertainties of existence.

Such is the proclamation upon which I would seek to found the new Society of Human Progress. If there are enough to coöperate with me, to encourage me, to build with me, I believe this child of hope may be born in the travail of enthusiasm in a single night, if all who are of one mind will congregate.

HENRY FRANK.

Our London Letter.

The National Sunday League is doing grand work in making the first day of the week more cheerful than it used to be. Now that the seaside excursions promoted by the society during the summer months are over, Sunday evening entertainments are given in various parts of London, consisting of lectures by able men, followed by music and singing by those who understand their work. It is quite possible the churches suffer by such superior attractions, consequently the preaching community is greatly disturbed, and has put forward a champion in the person of the secretary of the Lord's Day Observance Society, who threatens to take action against those responsible for all secular entertainments given on Sunday. An act of Parliament passed a century ago will be hauled out of its obscurity as an instrument to wreak vengeance against the parson's enemies; but whether the threat will be carried out remains to be seen, as the league has the means and will make a stiff fight, and it will cost the bigots no inconsiderable trifle even if they succeed in getting a conviction. There is a large and increasing number of Londoners who are heartily tired of the clerical party, and will not readily submit to the priestly yoke being placed upon their necks now that they hav tasted the sweets of freedom.

Considering the continual exposures of clerical doings, it would be the better policy of the tribe to keep quiet for a time. Dr. Clutterbeck, just sentenced to the ridiculously short term of four years' penal servitude, for embezzling about £40,000; the Rev. S. J. Cotton, committed for trial on charges of brutality to children and manslaughter; S. Whalley, a pious solicitor, so pious that he had a little oratory in his office where he "had passed many happy hours in silent communion with his maker," as he told a confiding client, has swindled to an enormous extent, and might hav gone on still further in the same direction if death had not claimed him—are three instances made public in the space of a few days as to the powerful effect for good a belief in Christ has upon man. These disclosures, thanks to the press, are not confined to the country in which they are made, but soon become universally known, and it is therefore little to be wondered at that Christian missionaries are not so favorably received in "heathen lands" as the missionary societies would wish. The Chinese are by no means to be commended for killing the Christians in King Chou and elsewhere, but they may think that is the only way of ridding themselvs of people whose religion covers so many rascalities. Persecution is always bad, whatever form it takes, and it is never resorted to in Christian countries. Stoning the small band of Mohammedans in Liverpool, imprisoning Freethinkers and Socialists, is not to be considered as persecution, but only a mild form of argument used for the benefit of the recipients of these little Christian attentions.

The vicar of Old Buckenham, Norfolk, has appealed to the archbishop of Canterbury to make an immediate effort to secure some additions to the incomes of the poor clergy, in order that they may not be reduced to bankruptcy. The first suggestion naturally is to appeal to the public, and the fourth and last is for the bishops to contribute according to their means, but no doubt when the scheme is fully formulated this last one will be excluded, although it is the only one that should be recognized.

There is a building at the east end of London known as the Red church, and this having been declared structurally unsafe, the vicar has been summoned for disobeying the order to put it in proper repair. The vicar said he was not the owner, and no one knew who was. The parson had appealed to the parishioners, who said they would see him a long way off first, as they had already, much to their disgust, to pay rates to support two other churches in the district, so things are at a standstill, and will no doubt remain so till it falls down and kills a few of the callous parishioners.

The "Little Georgia Magnet," otherwise Mrs. Abbott, is doing well with her tricks, and seems able to bamboozle large audiences. A reporter on the Star newspaper claims to hav discovered how it is done, and has arrived at the same conclusion as your correspondent, Mr. W. P. Butler. In the mean time the lady draws well, and secures a salary of £150 per week. The exposure has done her no harm, and has really been a good advertisement. As usual, the majority of people believe in her "magnetic" powers. What a good thing it is for fraud that there are so many fools with money.

Effect of the World's Fair on the Human Race.

From the Illustrated World's Fair.

The great Fair should be for the intellectual, mechanical, artistic, political, and social advancement of the world.

Nations, like small communities, are in danger of becoming provincial, and must become so, unless they exchange commodities, theories, thoughts, and ideals. Isolation is the soil of ignorance, and ignorance is the soil of egotism, and nations, like individuals who liv apart, mistake provincialism for perfection, and hatred of all other nations for patriotism. With most people, strangers are not only enemies, but inferiors. They imagin that they are progressiv because they know little of others, and compare their present, not with the present of other nations, but with their own past.

Few people hav imagination enough to sympathize with those of a different complexion, with those professing another religion or speaking another language, or even wearing garments unlike their own. Most people regard every difference between themselvs and others as an evidence of the inferiority of the others. They hav not intelligence enough to put themselvs in the place of another if that other happens to be outwardly unlike themselvs.

Countless agencies hav been at work for many years destroying the hedges of thorn that hav so long divided nations, and we at last are beginning to see that other people do not differ from us, except in the same particulars that we differ from them. At last, nations are becoming acquainted with each other, and they now know that people everywhere are substantially the same. We now know that, while nations differ outwardly in form and feature, somewhat in theory, philosophy, and creed, still, inwardly—that is to say, so far as hopes and passions are concerned—they are much the same, having the same fears, experiencing the same joys and sorrows. So we are beginning to find that the virtues belong exclusivly to no race, to no creed, and to no religion; that the humanities dwell in the hearts of men, whomever and whatever they may happen to worship. We hav at last found that every creed is of necessity a provincialism, destined to be lost in the universal.

At last, Science extends an invitation to all nations, and places at their disposal its ships and cars; and when these people meet—or rather, the representativs of these people—they will find that, in spite of the accidents of birth, they are, after all, about the same; that their sympathies, their ideas of right and wrong, of virtue and vice, of heroism and honor, are substantially alike. They will find that in every land honesty is honored, truth respected and admired, and that generosity and charity touch all hearts.

So it is of the greatest importance that the inventions of the world should be brought beneath one roof. These inventions, in my judgment, are destined to be the liberators of mankind. They enslave forces and compel the energies of nature to work for man. These forces hav no backs to feel the lash, no tears to shed, no hearts to break.

The history of the world demonstrates that man becomes what we call civilized by increasing his wants. As his necessities increase, he becomes industrious and energetic. If his heart does not keep pace with his brain, he is cruel, and the physically or mentally strong enslave the physically or mentally weak. At present these inventions, while they hav greatly increased the countless articles needed by man, hav to a certain extent enslaved mankind. In a savage state there are few failures. Most anyone succeeds in hunting and fishing. The wants are few and easily supplied. As man becomes civilized, wants increase; or rather as wants increase man becomes civilized. Then the struggle for existence becomes complex; failures increase.

The first result of the invention of machinery has been to increase the wealth of the few. The hope of the world is that through invention man can finally take such advantage of these forces of nature, of the weight of water, of the force of wind, of steam, of electricity, that they will do the work of the world; and it is the hope of the really civilized that these inventions will finally cease to be the property of the few, to the end that they may do the work of all for all.

When those who do the work own the machines, when those who toil control the inventions, then, and not till then, can the world be civilized or free. When these forces shall do the bidding of the individual, when they become the property of the mechanic instead of the monopoly, when they belong to labor instead of what is called capital, when these great powers are as free to the individual laborer as the air and light are now free to all, then, and not until then, the individual will be restored and all forms of slavery will disappear.

Another great benefit will come from the Fair. Other nations in some directions are more artistic than we, but no nation has made the common as beautiful as we hav. We hav given beauty of form to machines, to common utensils, to the things of every day, and hav thus laid the foundation for producing the artistic in its highest possible forms. It will be of great benefit to us to look upon the paintings and marbles of the Old World. To see them is an education.

The great republic has lived a greater poem than the brain and heart of man hav as yet produced, and we hav supplied material for artists and poets yet unborn; material for form and color and song. The republic is to-day art's greatest market.

Nothing is so well calculated to make friends of all nations as to really become acquainted with the best that each has produced. The nation that has produced a great poet, a great artist, a great statesman, a great thinker, takes its place on an equality with other nations of the world, and transfers to all of its citizens some of the genius of its most illustrious men.

This great Fair will be an object-lesson to the other nations. They will see the result of a government republican in form, where the people are the source or authority, where governors and presidents are servants—not rulers. We want all nations to see the Great Republic as it is, to study and understand its growth, development and destiny. We want them to know that here, under our flag, are sixty-five millions of people and that they are the best fed, the best clothed and the best housed in the world. We want them to know that we are solving the great social problems, and that we are going to demonstrate the right and power of man to govern himself. We want the subjects of other nations to see a land fillled with citizens—not subjects; a land in which the pew is above the pulpit; where the people are superior to the state; where legislators are representativs and where authority means simply the duty to enforce the people's will.

Let us hope above all things that this Fair will bind the nations together closer and stronger; and let us hope that this will result in the settlement of all national difficulties by arbitration instead of war. In a savage state, individuals settle their own difficulties by an appeal to force. After a time these individuals agree that their difficulties shall be settled by others. This is the first great step toward civilization. The result is the establishment of courts. Nations at present sustain to each other the same relations that savage does to savage. Each nation is left to decide for itself, and it generally decides according to its strength—not the strength of its side of the case, but the strength of its army. The consequence is that what is called the Law of Nations is a savage code. The world will never be civilized until there is an international court. Savages begin to be civilized when they submit their difficulties to their peers. Nations will become civilized when they submit their difficulties to a great court, the judgments of which can be carried out, all nations pledging the coöperation of their armies and their navies for that purpose. If the holding of this great Fair shall result in hastening the coming of that time it will be a blessing to the whole world.

And here let me prophesy: The Fair will be worthy of Chicago, the most wonderful city of the world—of Illinois, the best State in the Union—of the United States, the best country on the earth. It will eclipse all predecessors in every department. It will represent the progressiv spirit of the Nineteenth Century. Beneath its ample roofs will be gathered the treasures of Art, and the accomplishments of Science. At the feet of the Republic will be laid the triumphs of our race, the best of every land.

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

The American Secular Union.

J. D. Shaw in the Independent Pulpit.

FROM THE TRUTH SEEKER'S report of the Philadelphia Congress of the American Secular Union, we conclude that the organization is almost defunct. This congress is characterized in that paper as the shortest and meanest one yet.

We hav never had any faith in the effectivness of the Westbrook-Craddock policy. Not that we are wanting in respect for Judge Westbrook and Miss Craddock, who hav for some time been its president and secretary, but because we could see no element of success in their methods.

We believe they hav done what they thought was for the best, but time has not shown it to be the best, and long ago we felt sure it would not. In their desire to enlist certain half-hearted, conservativ Liberals in its behalf, which of course we would be glad to hav done, they hav antagonized the only real, out and out, aggressiv friends the Union ever had.

We are now to hav a new administration and we hope it will adopt a new policy, for if it does not the organization might as well disband. The new officers are: President, C. B. Waite; vice-presidents, J. F. Gosting, Dr. Greer, W. S. Andres, and E. M. Greer; secretary, Mrs. M. A. Freeman; treasurer, M. Reiman.

Of these we know very little, except that Judge Waite, the president, is an able lawyer and the author of a valuable book, "History of the Christian Religion to the Year 200 A.D." Mrs. Freeman, the new secretary, is a lecturer, of whom we hav seen many favorable reports, and the present secretary of the Chicago Secular Union. So far we hav had no intimation of what policy this administration will pursue, and await future developments with a good deal of anxiety, earnestly wishing for it greater success than has ever yet been realized by those preceding it.

We hav never lost our interest in the success of the Union, nor our faith in the justice of its demands, and whatever may befall the present organization, we mean to work for a Secular government, and we believe this will some day be accomplished, if not by the American Secular Union, by some other organization.

We would be pleased to hav the joint coöperation of Spiritualists, Free Religionists, Unitarians, and Seventh Day Adventists, in working for the Nine Demands of Liberalism, and there is no good reason why this may not be realized, but the Liberals must not seek such alliances by compromising with orthodox religion. But for the bigotry and selfishness of religion there would be no occasion for those demands, and the nearest, if not the only way to their accomplishment is by the overthrow of superstition.

Those so-called Liberals who hold themselvs aloof from all antagonism of orthodoxy are not entirely useless to us in the struggle for Freethought, but they are of very little use. Compared to the aggressiv Liberals, in the army of Freethinkers, they remind one of the chaplains and hospital "rats" that always find shelter in the rear of a fighting army.

If the principles of the American Secular Union ever prevail in this country, it will be when Liberalism triumphs over superstition, and that it can never do by a half-earnest, half-hearted compromising policy. We must not hesitate to meet orthodoxy in open fight; we must come to blows with bigotry, and hit superstition from the shoulder.

We make no war upon other and more conservativ Liberals, nor do we war upon Liberal Christians. Our fight is with superstition, and with it we make no compromise. We make it, too, on intellectual grounds, and for weapons use reason, facts, and arguments, drawn from science, history, observation, and experience. We abhor invectiv and vituperation. For the victims of superstition we hav a feeling of pity and kindness, but for superstition itself we hav loathing and contempt. It is superstition we fight and not the people who are enslaved by it. We hav been so enslaved and owe our present freedom to reason, hence by reason we seek to emancipate others.

The "let-orthodoxy-alone" policy will never overthrow superstition. It must be met with an aggressiv spirit. It must be overcome by rational methods, and no organization can expect to secularize this country that opposes such methods. The fact that a man or an organization is Liberal counts but little in the fight with superstition. Such men and organizations should oppose superstition. They should show its unfitness to thrive and rescue from it the people upon whom it preys. When this is done Secularism can flourish, but not until then.

Lecturer Putnam Banqueted.

From the Stockton, Cal., Daily Independent.

At a reception which was given last Friday night at the residence of Charles Haas to Samuel P. Putnam, the Liberal League lecturer, progressiv eucher was played and a repast was then served. W. F. Freeman, who presided at the table and acted as toastmaster, said, when the ladies and gentlemen sat down:

"Giving thanks before meals is not yet an obsolete custom. Personally, I believe in it, and if by a miracle this elegant and sumptuous repast was provided I should deem it appropriate to thank God for it. But as the eatables and decorations were provided by the ladies and the wine presented by A. Schell, I shall, on behalf of those present, reverently and affectionately thank them for it."

The toasts and those who responded to them were:

"Our honored guest, poet and author, soldier and lecturer, a symposium of talents, which can edify and please us in our homes, defend us upon the battlefield, and represent Liberalism upon the platform." Responded to by Mr. Putnam.

"Freethought, national, its growth and influence." H. B. Loomis.

"Freethought local, a retrospect of its history." Dr. A. T. Hudson, first president of the Pioneer Liberal Society of Stockton.

"Germany, its people and its literature, true to the principles of Freethought." Dr. A. T. Hudson.

"Organization and methods of presenting our opinions to the public." Victor Heck.

"The Liberal press and literature." Putnam.

"The society of Turn Verein, although an offspring of a government of kings, is an exemplar of civil, political, and religious liberty in its broadest sense, ever ready to coöperate for their promotion or defense." Charles Wagner.

Lectures and Meetings.

W. S. BELL will lecture at Phœnix, Ariz., December 27th, 28th, 29th; San Pasquale, Cal., January 2d, 3d.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH'S present lecture appointments are as follows: December 27th, 28th, Centralia; 30th, 31st, Waterloo, Ind.; January 10th, Columbus, O; 11th, 12th, Shreve; 24th, Kent; 27th, 28th, Farmdale; 29th, Pittsburgh, Pa.

THE regular Friday evening meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club will be held as usual on Friday, December 25th, which this year happens to be Christmas. Instead of the regular form of lecture and debate, there will be an illustrated (lantern) lecture on "The Seven Wonders of the Human Body and Some of Its Freaks," by E. B. Foote, Jr., M.D. Visitors are requested to be in their seats before 8.15, at German Masonic Hall, 220 E. 15th street.

Evening and the Grave.

Another day, on fading ray,
Now wings his flight from earth away;
Another sun his course has run,
Another day of toil is done.
In peace the day comes after night;
In peace it givs its midday light;
In peace let day depart and go,
And with it all its care and woe.
Blessed be the sun that givs the light;
And blessed the shadows of the night.
In glory came the sun and day;
In glory pass they both away.

The phantom night, in hasty flight,
Up from the east comes into sight;
On shadowy wings it darkness brings
O'er living forms and lifeless things.
Come, starry night; come, moonlit sky;
A longer night comes by and by
When in death's garb the soul is dressed,
And sleeps the sleep of endless rest.
Then shall this being cease to be
A wave upon life's troubled sea;
This whirlwind cloud of dust and force
Shall end its being and its course.

No specter sight in shadowy night,
More than in day of sun and light;
No fairy host, no golden ghost,
Comes to the brave from deathland's coast.
No mysteries beyond the grave
More than in life. Be true and brave;
Each day you meet the unforetold,
Yet fear not what the morrow holds.
Night is the absence of the day,
And death is naught but life away.
Blessed be the day that brought us life,
And blessed the day that ends its strife.

News and Notes.

A bright evening, a full house, closed the campaign at Lemoore. The latch-string is always out here, and a cordial invitation to come back. My friend Dr. Moore, one of the founders of the place, is now absent. His wife has died since I was here. The memory of these friends is delightful, mingled with the darkness that is inevitable the starlight shining with remembrance and hope.

I enjoyed the pleasant little home of Mr. and Mrs. P. Ting, who are now located here. They were formerly in the Kaweah colony, which has met with such pathetic failure. It is difficult to decide just where the blame lies for this ending of so many bright hopes. But I guess it is in the faults and frailties of human nature as it is. Coöperation and individuality seem to be conflicting elements. It will probably take ages to unfold the wisdom that will harmonize these splendid possibilities without destroying the glory of each.

My somewhat hermit friend, Dr. Morse, enjoys philosophy and poetry in his modest cabin. Shakspere, Shelley, Pope, Voltaire, Paine, make golden light in the shadowy evening hour. The splendor of genius illuminates the veteran's path.

Fox and Sweetland, comrades true and generous; the Cunninghams, bold reformers, who believe in labor's coming triumph; Dr. B. Hamlin and wife; W. M. Gill, of the Lemoore Leader, and others make up our genial forces, and there will always be sunshine for the Freethought toiler in this fruitful region.

Saturday morning early I leave the warm fireside of my friends the Foxes, where the Liberal spirit, both of the here and the hereafter, prevails. Whether there are spirits or not I do not know, but my friends behold their shining garments, and I am sure, if there is anything in the "unseen universe," it flung its beauty upon that sunny morning of my departure.

Rapidly away to the criptural land of Goshen, and thence to Modeston, and thence by stage in the cool and brilliant evening air over the vast plains to Oakdale, stretches my far and winding journey. Oakdale has quite a lively element of Freethought. The camp fires glow here and the heart warms. I lecture on Saturday night to a full house. Dr. J. M. Endicott makes a stirring introductory address, which givs the key-note of the campaign. On Sunday afternoon I lecture on "The Religious Conspiracy." Dr. Endicott makes an excellent speech on "Knowledge and Belief." In the evening every seat is occupied with one of the best audiences I hav addressed. Oakdale is on the front line of the Liberal movement. Fifty-one names are on the list of those who contributed to the expenses.

The Free Methodists made a dash at Freethought, with true chivalrous devotion to their cause. They sang in the cold night air, and the clarion voice of the preacher was heard. They summoned to the walls of Zion. "Don't be cold and indifferent," said the exhorter; "investigate, investigate." I attended the Sunday services, and was willing to investigate; but I do not believe the preacher came to my lecture to investigate what he declared was correct—if he would only investigate both sides. I do not know whether any souls were saved, but our ranks remained undiminished.

Dr. J. M. Endicott and Dr. R. H. Endicott are our accomplished supporters here. Occupying a high position in their profession, they are still free and independent, and giv Liberalism a character in the community. I am under obligations to them for their generous coöperation and for social and intellectual enjoyment. I am in hopes that J. M. Endicott will some time hav the leisure to devote his services to the Liberal lecture field. He has the points well mastered, and can deliver them with vigor and effect. He has had a lively experience in politics, and knows how to make a rattling campaign. I think he can knock out theology as easily as St. John was knocked out, whom the Kansas politicians dubbed equal to Jesus, but who was buried nevertheless beneath a stupendous majority, which the doctor helped to make. There is one question the doctor propounds which would certainly puzzle the astutest theologian: "Where was the devil during the flood?" The fountains of the great deep were broken up, hell was submerged, the fires were put out; what in the devil did the devil do with himself during this racket? John Hubbell, H. Dickson, J. R. Horseley, Jr., Prowse brothers, and many more are on the roll. I mark Oakdale as one of the shining points in the pathway of reform.

Monday I visit Red Mountain Vineyard, twelv miles from Oakdale. I am glad to meet again Mr. A. Schell, who has been such a valiant warrior for Freethought—always at the head of the column when there is anything to do or dare. His mind is clear and bright, fearless of death. I hope it will be many a long day before the stars of memory shine over the "windowless palace" of rest. Mr. Schell and Mr. and Mrs. Herrick Schell I also meet in this beautiful home, and other friends. It is a lovely day's journey from Oakdale to Knight's Ferry and return. The distant snowy peaks are shining. The soft green hills with fringe of woods roll away from the meandering river. I start when morning's sunshine floods the landscapes with warm delight, and come to the finish while evening's changing splendor drops into the immeasurable night, and the twinkling lights of Oakdale merge into the glory of the countless stars.

On Thursday morning I speed in the sunshine and fresh breeze to Modesto, where I giv three lectures. This is a pioneer town; Colonel Kelso used to reside here and shake up the dry bones of orthodoxy; but for many years the light of Freethought has glowed dimly, and it is difficult to rally the old guard. No wonder—there are seven churches in Modesto, and they want no Infidels on the ranch. However, Modesto has great capabilities; there are stanch Liberals, and our Spiritualist friends stand in the front rank.

Captain James, one of the earliest settlers of this country, initiates the movement for the present series of lectures. It was an experiment and on the whole something has been gained.

I gave three lectures in Good Templars' Hall; the first evening was stormy and not a great many were out. Rev. Mr. Briggs, of the Christian church, put in an appearance, and took notes. I spoke upon the "Demands of Liberalism," and when I had explained them called for debate. Instantly Rev. Mr. Briggs was upon his feet. Instead, however, of a doughty warrior, I had only a genial critic who admitted that all I said was about right. He did not make any issue upon the Sunday question. He frankly declared that if it had been in order he would have cracked the ceiling with his amens in indorsement of many things I said. He was not in favor of a union of church and state. I told him that as we agreed on the question of human rights, it was now profitable to proceed to our points of difference, namely, the Bible, was it divine or human? I challenged him to a discussion on that question. He expressed his regret that he could not be present at my following lectures on "The Bible" and "Freethought and Morality," but declared his readiness to meet me at some future time. At the close of the meeting he came forward and shook hands. I guess he has the courage of his convictions, and will defend his faith. I had largely increased numbers at my succeeding lectures, and am hopeful of the progress to be made at this point. At the last lecture of the series I read my public challenge to Rev. Mr. Briggs to debate the following some time in January: "Resolved, That the Bible is the divinely inspired word of God." If the debate takes place it will stir up the orthodox pulse of Modesto, and light will flash. The Liberals of Modesto are anxiously waiting to see if the reverend champion will stand by his word. In his own pulpit he has flung down the gauntlet to the Infidel. Will he dare to meet him on a fair field with no favor? Evidently he has plenty of faith in himself—but has he sufficient faith in the Bible?

I hav had a most agreeable social intercourse in Modesto. I enjoyed the hospitality of Mr. and Mrs. C. Lee. Mr. Lee is a contributor to many journals. He is a Liberal Spiritualist and wields a trenchant pen against the old theology. Professor and Mrs. Twombly were with us at the same time, and I found them agreeable friends. Professor Twombly is to giv a series of lectures on anthropology and kindred subjects after mine. He seems to be a sensible scientific reformer.

S. L. Hanscom, of the Modesto Herald, is an editor who dares to tackle wrong wherever he sees it. He has experienced rough times, and met danger's front. His enemies hav tried to hang him and to shoot him, but he still livs, and his attacks are as vigorous as ever. All the Hanscoms are Liberals.

I had the pleasure of meeting Mr. and Mrs. Thompson at their home. Mr. Thompson was not able to be at the lectures on account of sickness, but his heart is with us. Mr. and Mrs. Lapham, Mr. Geer and sons, Judge Catron, are stanch friends. Mr. E. M. Bemis is on the roll of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I believe the fires are beginning to burn around these seven churches, and the cold shadows will disappear.

Modesto is a pretty place with twenty-five hundred inhabitants and an excellent country about it. Grain has been the great commodity in the past. The land is farmed on a large scale. There are but few small holdings. Fruits, however, are extensivly cultivated, and the immense acreage is being broken up into orchards and vineyards, and a hundred homes will one day shine where now there is only one. The material prosperity of Modesto has been hampered by monopolies, but the day of the people is coming.

FIGHTING is a soldier's religion; I never changed that. The other is the affair of women and priests. —Napoleon Bonaparte.

The Cause at Large.

INDIVIDUAL EFFORT THE DUTY OF EVERY LIBERAL

Infidels despise those who fail to liv up to their professions. Our whole creed, faith, code of morality, rule of life, is all summed up in one word—justice. Knowing our duty, able to perform it, is there any justice in shirking it—in leaving to others or leaving undone the work we can and ought to do?

There is no longer any shadow of pretext for depending on the so-called national organization. The American Secular Union never proved a brilliant success. For years it has "kept the word of promis to our ear, only to break it to our hope." As a pansy or Theistical-Unitarian society it was a wretched failure. Under the last administration, claiming to be an organization of Liberals, it sailed, or, to speak more correctly, it "stagnated" under false colors. The Liberal Union died long ago; feeble attempts hav been made to galvanize it into seeming life, but decomposition was too far advanced. "The offense was rank and smelled to heaven." Let us be thankful—without proclamation—that at last it is buried.

It is useless to lament the past, to denounce the errors of the dead, or rehearse the wrongs perpetrated, only as we refer to them in order to profit by the experience and avoid similar mistakes.

More real service was rendered to the cause, more actual good was accomplished, by the few dollars sent to THE TRUTH SEEKER fund for free distribution of Liberal literature than by all the thousands of dollars contributed to the American Secular Union.

Organization is absolutely necessary to success; but it must be real, practical, efficient, with clearly defined aim and objects, and definit practical plan of work, ways and means steadily employed to secure those objects, and zeal, ability, and self-sacrificing devotion to the cause on the part of its officers and prompt regular payment of dues by its members.

Having no longer the scapegoat of the national Union on which to lay the burden of our work it is self-evident that if the car of progress is to roll onward individual effort must giv the impetus.

THE TRUTH SEEKER SUGGESTIONS.

The suggestions of the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER commend themselvs to every intelligent worker for the cause, and should meet appreciation testified by prompt response.

All know the importance attached to a personal letter. The Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER has drafted a letter to members of Congress admirably adapted to the purpose in view (published in issue of November 28th) giving suggestions as to what to write that will prove of great help to many.

Reader, do you desire to defeat the Sunday fanatics? Do you desire to promote justice by having the World's Fair open on Sunday? Do you wish to prevent the passing and enforcement of rigid Sunday laws? Do you? Then prove it and show your appreciation of the admirable practical suggestions of the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and at once write letters to your members of Congress and Senator. Write in your own style, use your own phraseology; you cannot be too urgent. But the "affair cries haste and speed must answer."

If you think you cannot compose a letter yourself, then copy the first three paragraphs, No. 7, and the last paragraph.

Do not put this duty off till to-morrow. Do it to-day, do it now, and mail it at once.

THE PRINTED LETTERS.

Having written and mailed your own letter to the member of Congress from your district, purchase a twenty-five-cent, fifty-cent, or $1 postal note and inclose it in a letter addressed to the Truth Seeker Company, 28 Lafayette place, New York, asking them to send you copies of letters to Congressmen urging opposition to closing the World's Fair on Sundays. Soon as copies are received induce every friend with whom you hav any influence to fill out blanks and mail to the member of Congress of their district one of those letters.

Of course if you meet any avowed Liberal who has not already done so, you will urge immediate action, nor cease your importunities till the letter is written and mailed.

ANOTHER IMPORTANT DUTY SUGGESTED BY THE TRUTH SEEKER

"We hope that whenever a Freethinker sees an article in his local paper in favor of opening the World's Fair on Sundays he will mark it and send a copy to Benjamin Butterworth, secretary Board of Directors of World's Fair, Rand McNally building, Chicago, Ill., and another copy to John T. Dickinson, secretary National Commission of World's Fair, at the same address. Let us make a vigorous and persistent fight in this matter. Our efforts must not slacken till the final decision is made, which may not be till 1893"

IN ADDITION.

And so there shall be plenty of such articles to send, let every Liberal write short articles for their local newspapers, not alone on the Sunday-closing question but on any, each, and all of the Nine Demands. (Those who lack ability to do this can persistently coax and urge those who are competent to do so.)

This is the surest, most economical means of reaching many devout Christians who really think that to read an Infidel book or paper would be a heinous sin.

It is prejudice honestly engendered, instilled in infancy, that has grown with their growth. They hav never questioned or examined the reason of their faith and hope. Yet such people will eagerly read and seriously ponder and discuss articles on the subject in their own local papers, and once they are led to investigate, the more honest and intelligent they are the more quickly the church loses and we gain a most consistent, earnest, zealous worker.

If we claim to love liberty, to rejoice in our escape from the snares and mire of superstition, let us prove it by making efforts to help others to evolute to the plane of mental liberty, love, and peace, where we find so much of happiness.

SEND IN THE NEEDED FUNDS.

Let all who can send in contributions to the Truth Seeker Company, so that the Editor can send out Liberal pamphlets to the right persons at the right time. The Editor is experienced, ever vigilant, able, and willing to do the work, and will do it, as in the past, without salary, fee, or reward. It is our duty to supply the funds to pay for the publications. Now, knowing our duty, let us do it and do it at once. Let our acts prove that we are genuin Liberals.

Spiritism.

In giving her experience in what is called spirit phenomena, Mrs. Underwood says the presence of her husband is necessary before she gets connected writing, and at one sitting asks the following question: "Q.—What is your chief desire in regard to us and your communications?" The reply is: "A.—Show you that your ephemeral state of existence, with all the little troubles which seem so terrible to you, are but transitory and yet necessary to spiritual development. Every hour of sorrow will in some future stage of being blossom into flowers of many happy experiences."

Now, if this be truth, it should be our aim to make everyone as miserable as possible, so they may hav a rapid "spiritual development." Begin with the little children and systematically work for their sorrow and trouble. What are fifty or one hundred years of misery here to fifty quadrillion of years "of blossoming into flowers of happy experiences" in the summer-land? If Mrs. Underwood and her husband believe this, they should at once begin to liv a cat-and-dog life, and do all they can to add to the "transitory" troubles of others. At least, this is how it all looks to me.

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

Into and Out of Infidelity.

I hav received a neat little pamphlet from Elijah P. Brown, editor of the Ram's Horn, of Indianapolis, Ind., which bears the title, "Into and Out of Infidelity." In the thirty-three pages of this book Mr. Brown givs an account of his "conversion" to Christianity.

Mr. Brown says he became an "Infidel" because he was poor and his life was full of continual hardship. That is his reason. He seems to hav believed the heinous stories of crime in the Bible were all right; that the world was made in six days was to him a probable occurrence; the story of the ark was believable, but because he was poor he became an Infidel.

Well, time went on, and he became a prosperous publisher. He was no longer poor, God had showered his gifts upon him, so Mr. Brown went to one of D. L Moody's sermons. He listened to the famous evangelist, and, wonder of wonders, he became suddenly a Christian. That is the story of Mr Brown's conversion, as told by himself. To me it is utterly silly.

Mr. Brown now claims that drunken Noah is his model of sobriety, licentious Lot his model of chastity, lying Jacob his model of truthfulness, and murderous David his model of brotherly love, and although he was once an "Infidel," he is awfully down on them now.

The Ram's Horn, Mr. Brown's paper, is a weekly religious comic journal. The main feature of each issue is a drawn-out continued story called "Meetin' Matters on the Ciderville Sirkut." There may be much of a highly moral and elevating nature in the "yarn," but I confess that to me it is nearly as vulgar and low as one of Moody's sermons, and the grammar, which is purposely "off," is no more so than the speech of evangelist Moody, who "saved" Mr. Brown's soul from the endless tortures of hell. Every unbeliever should read Mr. Brown's funny little pamphlet, and his great religious comic weekly (weakly).

Queer Logic.

Mr. Ingersoll, in his lecture before the Chicago Press Club, telling what he meant by liberty of body, said: "It is to giv to every man what he earns with his hands, and this great question of division has got to be settled even in the United States. Capital takes too much; labor gets too little. Labor will not always liv in a hut with capital dwelling in a palace. Flesh and blood are more sacred than gold, and the time will come when the law will see that every man has the right to life, liberty, and the pursuit not only of happiness, but the right to catch some of it before he dies. I want to liv until there is such a thing as the aristocracy of labor. I want to liv until I find an aristocracy of honesty, of generosity; an aristocracy of intelligence; an aristocracy of heart and brain. I am sick of the old kind. I want liberty for every man. I do not believe in the law of supply and demand as applied to flesh and blood. If they who toil cannot hav some of the good things of this world, then I do not want anybody to hav them." And yet, only a short time ago, he said he was in favor of compelling people to pay $30 a ton for steel rails, even though they were worth but $25 a ton—not in these words, but that is what it amounted to. If, reckoning the cost of material and labor, steel rails—or anything else, as to that matter—can be produced, at as fair a profit as other things, the products of labor, for $25, the person who givs $30 is mulcted out of $5; and mankind is no better off for the transaction. And if any person is deprived of the liberty of purchasing where he can exchange the value of the products of his labor for the value of the products of other labor, he has not that liberty which will bring about the aristocracy of labor.

Seems to me Mr. Ingersoll uses queer logic. His idea of liberty seems to be somewhat limited.

English and American Protestantism.

From the New York Tribune.

Last summer a distinguished American clergyman preached a sermon before the International Congregational Concil in London so intensely Calvinistic in its tone as to amaze even the most conservativ of English Congregationalists, who did not imagin that any representativ clergymen to-day held such views. And when the Ecumenical Methodist Conference was held in Washington last October the theological liberality of many English Methodists amazed their American brethren, who would classify as heretics men in this country holding similar opinions. These two incidents emphasize a fact not generally understood, namely, that English Protestantism has left American Protestantism far behind in its attempt to adjust itself to the needs of modern life. "We hav," says Dr. Conder, one of the most distinguished of English Congregationalists, "lost orthodoxy, but hav gained Christ. The old theology did not perish under the assault of a rival system: it did not not quail before a logic more rigorous than its own. It expired because an atmosphere had been created in which it could not breathe." Similarly Professor Simon, another distinguished English Congregationalist, describes the results of this revolutionary reaction against dogma: "Scarcely is a passing reference now made to the divine sovereignty; the divine decrees and predestination hav been exorcised; election has been metamorphosed. In dealing with man, our starting-point is less and less distinctly the fall, inherited depravity, guilt, and moral inability; instead we dwell on his filial relation to God, either by nature or in Christ, on the good that is to be found even in the worst, on his weakness, conflicts, sorrows, misfortunes, and assert either his freedom or blamelessness for the lack thereof. On the question of man's future destiny we are in the main divided between Universalism, the doctrin of life in Christ, the Larger Hope, and various phases of a non-committal position—the sterner views of a generation ago seem to hav well-nigh disappeared."

Now, what these gentlemen say of English Congregationalism is true in a measure of the whole of British Protestantism, including the Anglican church. Mr. Spurgeon's denunciation of the Liberal drift in the Baptist churches as the "down grade in theology" will be recalled by all, and becomes especially significant when it is remembered that Mr. Spurgeon is almost the only conspicuous English Baptist who adheres to the old views. The Liberalism of the English Methodists has already been referred to. Broad Churchism in the English establishment is rapidly growing in power and influence, and the younger wing of the High Church party, represented by the authors of "Lux Mundi," is busily engaged in minimizing dogmas that are unacceptable to the consciousness of the age. When we turn to the great Presbyterian branch of British Protestantism, we find the revolution in thought and belief equally startling. In all its divisions it has so radically changed its theology that, as Dr. Bradford recently said, such a controversy as that over Professor Briggs would be laughed off the stage in Great Britain.

Now, why is it that while British Protestantism is thus moving forward, or backward, if you will—at any rate, it is moving—American Protestantism is virtually standing still intellectually? There are many answers to this question. For one thing, Europe is the center and source of all original religious speculation, and so we get fresh religious ideas in this country only after they hav become commonplaces there. Then again, as Dr. Munger well points out, England has revised its theology because its social problems hav made such a revision necessary. American social problems hav not yet reached a stage where the good offices of religion seem necessary. And so our preachers go on preaching the old theology, which is almost wholly concerned with the personal salvation of the individual and his happiness in the world to come. The English preachers say much less about the divinity of Christ than about his humanity, because in England, with its congested population and its terrible contrasts between wealth and poverty, they need a Christ who is human. Theology, however true speculativly, is utterly unable to solve the sociological problems which now confront English Christianity.

But "orthodox" American Protestants must not suppose that this state of affairs will continue indefinitly. The Liberal drift has already gained a good headway in this country, and before many years the revolutionary reaction against dogma will be quite as marked among us as it is to day in Great Britain.

What Colonel Ingersoll Thinks of Missionaries.

From the Cleveland Press.

Col. Robert Ingersoll is staying at the Forest City House. Also at the hotel are Bishops Foster, Fowler, Hurst, and a host of other distinguished Methodists on the general missionary committee of the Methodist Episcopal church, which began business Wednesday morning. It is a part of the work of this committee to distribute the funds gathered to missions all over the world, and a large part goes annually to Asia, Africa, and other heathen climes. It was regarding foreign missions that Colonel Ingersoll had a word to say. He spoke as follows:

"In the first place there seems to be a pretty good opening in this country for missionary work. We hav a good many Indians who are not Methodists. I hav never known one to be converted. A good many hav been killed by Christians, but their souls hav not been saved. Maybe the Methodists had better turn their attention to the heathen of our own country. Then we hav a good many Mormons who rely on the truth of the Old Testament, and follow the example of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. It seems to me that the Methodists better convert the Mormons before attacking the tribes of central Africa. There is plenty of work to be done right here. A few good bishops might be employed for a while in converting Dr. Briggs and Professor Swing, to say nothing of other heretical Presbyterians.

"There is no need of going to China to convert the Chinese. There are thousands of them here. In China our missionaries tell the followers of Confucius about the love and forgivness of Christians, and when the Chinese come here they are robbed, assaulted, and often murdered. Would it not be a good thing for the Methodists to civilize our own Christians to such a degree that they would not murder a man simply because he belongs to another race and worships other gods?

"So, too, I think it would be a good thing for the Methodists to go South and persuade their brethren in that country to treat the colored people with kindness. A few efforts might be made to convert the 'White Caps' in Ohio, Indiana, and some other states.

"My advice to the Methodists is to do what little good they can right here and now.

"It seems cruel to preach to the heathen a gospel that is dying out even here and fill their poor minds with the absurd dogmas and cruel creeds that intelligent men hav outgrown and thrown away.

"Honest commerce will do a thousand times more good than all the missionaries on earth. I do not believe that an intelligent Chinaman or an intelligent Hindoo has ever been or ever will be converted into a Methodist. If Methodism is good we need it here, and if it is not good do not fool the heathen with it."

Subscribers.

The holidays are almost here. Are you ready for them? A gift that would prove acceptable to any Liberal friend, and at the same time keep you in constant remembrance during the year, would be a year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. Your own renewal and the new subscription will cost only $5 00.

WAS CHRIST CRUCIFIED?

In the first issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER for the New Year we shall print an article with the foregoing question for its title, by author of "The Socialism of Christ" and "The Virtues and Their Reasons," a System of Ethics for Society and Schools.

Austin Bierbower,

THE TRUTH SEEKER will put on its new dress on New Year's, and appear also in a more modern make-up, with all of its old and some new features.

The make-up will be so arranged that the subscribers who desire to forward the paper to semi-Liberal friends but are deterred because of a fear that the pictures will offend their semi-religious sensitivness can remove the objectionable matter without destroying any of the reading matter. And we sincerely trust that those who hav refrained from doing missionary work with the paper on this account will feel their interest revived and intensified and act accordingly.

To Our Subscribers.

We are in sore need of the amounts due on subscriptions and ask everyone who owes us money to be especially prompt in sending it.

This also is the time of year when a great many subscriptions expire, and an immediate renewal will be a favor to us.

Owing probably to the elections and the labor incident to gathering and marketing the great harvests our friends hav neglected to forward what is due us, and we are consequently compelled to somewhat urgently remind them of their remissness. As Mr. Bennett used to say under these circumstances, Friends, let us hear from you.

To the Friends and Subscribers of Freethought.

I sincerely hope that all who hav supported Freethought in the past will aid the work to which it has been devoted by becoming subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER. THE TRUTH SEEKER will carry on the work, but it needs your coöperation. It is a means by which I can reach you and push on the Pacific coast labors. Especially I ask those in arrears to pay what is now due to THE TRUTH SEEKER and place their names upon its list as cordial supporters for the future.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

About Sunday Observance.

The Sabbatarians are early at work upon Congress in the matter of Sunday opening of the World's Fair. In the Senate last week memorials against such opening were presented, and favoring the loan or gift of five million dollars only upon that condition.

We again urge the friends of freedom, justice, and fair play to be activ in opposition to the bigots. Our circular letter is now ready, and will be sent to all who apply for it. Every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER certainly ought to fill out one, and see that his friends fill out others, and send to his representativ at Washington.

We are also exceedingly glad to be able to state that the American Secular Union at last recognizes the importance of intervening in this matter. The board of directors hav resolved to hold a public meeting to ask for Sunday opening of the Fair on the evening of February 28th. It ought to be a rousing gathering. The cause is grand, the necessity imminent. Let every Liberal within hailing distance make it his business to attend and aid by his voice and presence the most pressing work of the day. The settlement of this question means a great deal. It is the drawing of the line—the decision whether this country is to be governed by American principles or lapse to the semi-barbarism of Puritan days.

The present president of the Union is also a more logical reasoner on the Sunday law controversy than his predecessor. At the board meeting at which it was determined to hold the public meeting here announced Judge Waite said he should move to amend the Demand regarding Sunday laws. The section now advocates "the repeal of all laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as a religious institution, rather than an economic one, justified by physiological and other secular reasons." Judge Waite desires to strike out all after the word Sunday. "I hold," he says, "that the state has no right to establish a day of rest any more than it has to fix the hours of rest at night. If the state is to enforce any day of rest it ought to be some other day than Sunday in order to avoid giving the sanction of the law to a day observed as a religious day of rest. But I deny the right of the state to establish any day of rest." That is the correct position to take—that no day of rest shall be observed by law—that is, its observance forced. The state may rightfully make a legal holiday—that is, when commercial paper shall not be endangered by lack of opportunity to attend to its provisions—but all should be absolutely free to work or play without regard to the day. Every Sunday should be a Fourth of July.

But the important work of the Union now is not verbal quibbling, but real efforts to preserve what liberty we now enjoy on Sundays. The stove-polishing statesman of Massachusetts, Mr. Elijah A. Morse, will not only be the House spokesman for the Sabbatarians for the closing of the World's Fair, but he will make an attempt to secure what Mr. Breckinridge failed to obtain—a Sunday law for the national capital. In this, as in the Fair question, he is backed up by our Presbyterian executiv; and while from the present House there is less danger of such a bill passing than in the last Congress it still behooves the Freethinkers and their allies to oppose the iniquitous measure strenuously.

In regard to the World's Fair, if any argument were necessary to show the importance of attempting to influence the representativs, it is furnished by the action of the Pennsylvania World's Fair commissioners. The Christian Statesman reports that a few weeks ago the commission, by a vote of nineteen to thirteen, refused to ask the national commission to close the Fair on Sunday. But last week the meritorious action was reversed and the Pennsylvania commission voted unanimously to make this request of the national body. The reason for the change is that the advocates of Sunday closing had labored with the state commission, talking to them and presenting memorials, and urging their friends to write to them upon the subject. In this way, and because opposition was not heard, the commission came to the conclusion that the people of Pennsylvania really wanted the Fair closed on Sundays, and, as faithful representativs, they voted as they supposed the people wanted them to. The Liberals of Pennsylvania ought now to take the matter up.

Fallacy Gobbling.

How in the name of wonder could the dogma of election and foreordination as expounded by Calvinism ever hav originated? He was a bold, independent thinker, who pioneered the way. It is derived chiefly from the epistle to Romans. Seeing that Christ had repeatedly replied to questions like this: "What shall I do to be saved?" "Love God and thy neighbor as thyself—this is all;" seeing that all his injunctions accorded therewith, such as, "Sell all thou hast and giv to the poor," etc., it is not a little strange that a professed follower of his could derive a doctrin in direct conflict with those announced by such an authority. How would it seem to him who had given all to the few, when he learned that such other and impossible conditions were attached to his prospects for eternity? The matter will not stand argument for one moment. But to see on what baseless foundations such mighty edifices may be erected, just let anyone, divesting himself of all prejudices, take up that epistle and study it. Repeatedly does the author say that the heathen, and all those who never knew the law, shall be judged without law. As plain as words can make it he says all mankind that ever hav been or shall be are saved by the sacrifice made by Christ. He imagins some auditor disputing with him, and asking why, then, need anyone try to conform to Christian ordinances; and answers him. Bearing in mind the belief frequently expressed by Paul and other apostles, as well as the prophecy of Christ, that the end of the world was near at hand, we see clearly what this doctrin of election means. The millennium is near at hand. We were chosen from before the foundations of this world were laid to liv in this happy time; we are the elect, chosen to liv so near to Christ's time and to plant the seeds of the gospel. Seeing that the doctrin of degrees of happiness runs through all the sayings of Christ, the elect may expect higher places or conditions in the future state. The thing is so plain that he who runs may read and understand. Bishop Colenso, with all his prejudices and preconceptions, was induced to giv a most careful, critical examination of this one epistle. His object was to settle a question as to whether there were any Christians in Rome when the epistle was published to Romans first. Like others, before this examination of every verse, he had read here and there a chapter or a few texts. After reading the epistle thus carefully and comparing translations with the Greek copies to see if any errors had crept into the former, he was perfectly astounded. He came out a believer in universal salvation, in consequence of the doctrins so clearly declared in that epistle. As to the election dogma we may illustrate it by supposing Thomas Jefferson making a speech at about the end of the Revolutionary war, and congratulating his hearers because they had been chosen to liv and be actors in the great work, and assuring them that they would go down through all the ages of eternity in this world and the world to come as glorious and honorable.

Priests are the greatest fallacy-mongers of all people. For example, they will read in Isaiah: "A virgin shall conceive and bear a son," and forthwith apply it to Jesus Christ, said to hav come some seven hundred years later, when the slightest perusal of the contexts would show that the whole affair was enacted within a few days after the sign was given to the king. Isaiah says he went with a witness right up unto the priestess, the virgin, who then and there conceived and bore a son, and he goes on to relate how rapidly the whole prophecy was fulfilled. And yet men of most profound learning, good sense, and Liberal views hav read that "eight-word text," and declared that it is the grand confirmation of Christianity. A like instance is seen in the description of the "Rock of Moses," now going the rounds of press and pulpit. A learned, wise bigwig of Oxford, Eng., journeying in the desert, says he has actually found the rock Moses struck for water. "It is eighteen feet square, has a channel two inches deep and a few inches wide. There are several holes in it two inches in diameter. From this rock, along this channel, flowed the waters to quench the thirst of the thousands standing around." A fair example this of the stupidity of such writers and average readers. Six hundred and four thousand men fit for war, "with all their women and children and much cattle," were led out by Moses as per the Arabian Nights tale of Exodus; that is, over three million souls quenching their thirst at a two-inch stream! And their "much cattle" also!

I was amused at an article in a late paper by some one, on the text about the sparrows and wild creatures, "how our heavenly father provideth their food in due season." Red in tooth and claw with the blood of each other, even the least and most harmless being a terror to bugs and insects, the writer thinketh the father ought not to take much credit to himself for such provision. "Go forth ye dear little ones and sport—when hungry just gobble each other up. Bless ye, my children!"

To Advertise a Book.

The following interesting document was received at this office one day last week:

COMPLAINT.

NEW YORK SUPREME COURT, KINGS COUNTY.

JOHN C. BUNDY, Plaintiff. against
THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY, Defendant.
} Complaint.

The plaintiff by Messrs. Dailey & Bell, his attorneys, for his cause of action against the defendant alleges and shows as follows:

1st. That the plaintiff is, and for a long time has been the editor of a public journal known as the "Religio Philosophical Journal" published in the City of Chicago, Illinois, and widely circulated throughout the United States and in foreign countries.

2nd. That the defendant at the time hereinafter mentioned was, and at the present time is, as plaintiff is informed and believes, a domestic corporation duly incorporated under the laws of the State of New York, engaged in the publication of a public journal known and designated as "The Truth Seeker." The defendant has its office and general place of business in the City of New York, and said Journal, as plaintiff is informed and believes, at the time hereinafter mentioned was widely circulated and read by various persons, and was exposed for sale and sold in public places throughout the United States.

3. That in its issue bearing date November 7th, 1891, the defendant printed, published, and exposed for sale, sold, and circulated a large number of copies of said journal, wherein i printed and published of and concerning this plaintiff the followlng false and malicious libel, to wit:

LINCOLN NOT A SPIRITUALIST.

MARENGO, ILL., Oct. 22, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: When that prince of Spiritualistic humbugs, "Colonel" Bundy, of the Religio-Philosophical Journal, concocted the latest scheme with the notorious Miss Colburn Maynard to draw the easily gulled into the Spiritualistic fold, said scheme being embodied in a book recently published by them relating how Lincoln became converted to their doctrin, they probably felt safe in so doing under the impression that "dead men tell no tales," but when a living one appeared in the person of Lincoln's private secretary, Nicolay, they must hav felt as though they had reckoned without their host after all. I inclose an extract from the Chicago News showing how their "little game" was spoiled, which will probably be read with great interest by your readers, as this latest invention has been published in numerous public journals, especially Eastern ones. The fraud, however, would hav been apparent even if Nicolay had not exposed it, for it is not at all likely that a quarter of a century would hav passed before Spiritualists had utilized the report that Lincoln attended séances if there was any truth in it. And yet this Bundy has the monumental cheek to introduce a law to put a stop to fraudulent mediumistic practices. It would be a pity if he were not caught in his own trap. If all bogus mediums and Spiritualistic quacks were expelled from their ranks, methinks there would be few, if any, left to bury the carcass of this greatest of all modern delusions, and if they were marked out according to their deserts, Bundy would lead the van. H. Wettstein.

That by the words "'Colonel' Bundy" contained in said libelous publication, defendant referred to this plaintiff, and the defendant in its said publication intended it to be understood that the plaintiff concocted a fraudulent scheme with a notorious and unreliable woman to gull and entice people into a belief in Spiritualism by relating how that Lincoln had been converted to their doctrin, and that the plaintiff was engaged in the promulgation of the greatest of all modern delusions, and that of all persons so engaged this plaintiff was the most culpable and unworthy.

4th. That said libel was, as plaintiff is informed and believes, widely read, and was published in connection with various other articles and illustrations tending to disgrace, and bring into ridicule and shame this plaintiff for his religious convictions and belief, to his great damage the sum of Ten Thousand Dollars.

Whereas, the plaintiff demands judgment of this Court in his favor and against the defendant for the sum of Ten Thousand Dollars, besides the costs of this action.

DAILEY & BELL,
Plaintiff's Attorneys.
Office and Post-office Address, No. 16 Court Street, Brooklyn, N. Y.

The book designed to be advertised is by Mrs. Maynard, entitled "Was Abraham Lincoln a Spiritualist?" It is a good stroke of business on the part of "Colonel" Bundy on behalf of his friend who wrote it and we hope the publishers will giv him a good share of the profit.

For our own part, we may say that if Mr. B. will waive his claim to that ten thousand dollars we will endeavor to induce Mr. Wettstein to say that he is not the prince of Spiritualistic humbugs—that he is not, indeed, a prince of any sort, nor even a Spiritualist. This latter ought certainly to repair any injury done to his religious beliefs.

In the mean time we hav the book for sale—price $1.50.

A Great Book.

Our Bible Picture Book will contain about four hundred pages, one-half of which will be full-page pictures and one-half reading matter, relating to the stories which the pictures illustrate. The text will lead to a full understanding of the tale, even as the artist's work illustrates it, with an electric searchlight brilliance unsurpassed by the torch of the golden goddess Diana on the Garden tower. Young people can learn more about the Old Testament and its heroes by reading this book than by reading the Old Testament itself. It is much more easily comprehended, and is written in more chaste language.

There will be twenty-six chapters in the book, twelv of which are completed, as follows:

I. Adventures of Adam.
II. The Origin of the Young Men's Christian Association.
III. Sustaining a Theory.
IV. Some Giants.
V. The Adventures and Work of Noah.
VI. A Hunting Anecdote.
VII. Abraham, Christ's Great Ancestor.
VIII. A Queer Family.
IX. Isaac and His "Sister."
X One of Twins.
XI. Jacob and Esau.
XII. Joseph, the Man of Dreams.

The book will afford many a hearty laugh, while we hav not forgotten to make it a solid attack upon the superstition which can venerate and believe the tales told in the Old Testament. So far as it goes it shows that book in its true colors, though of course we hav omitted the Old Testament obscenity in order to make our work one admissible in all families and readable by all ages and sexes.

The price of our work is $1. Orders will be cheerfully booked now and filled as soon as the work comes from the press.

Books in Fine Bindings for Holiday Gifts.

We hav a large number of books suitable for holiday gifts, many of them in extraordinarily fine bindings, and we call the attention of our readers to them, hoping that when selection of presents is made the list will be consulted and purchases made therefrom. Among them are Paine's works, complete, in cloth, $3; leather, red edges, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4 50; the World's Sages, in same style of binding and at same prices as Paine's works; Ingersoll's Prose Poems, in cloth, $2 50; half morocco, $5; turkey morocco, $7 50; tree calf, $9. These are magnificent volumes. Also his principal lectures bound in one volume for $5. Either of Miss Wixon's books, The Story Hour, Apples of Gold, All in a Lifetime, is very suitable for a present, the first particularly for children. Voltaire's Romances, cloth, $1.50; half calf, $4, is a fine and uncommon work. D. M. Bennett's Around the World, in sets of four volumes, profusely illustrated, red cloth, $6.50, is a splendid present to a friend or to young men and women. It is full of practical to-day information about other countries and the noted things therein. The latest book which the Spiritualists are discussing is, Was Abraham Lincoln a Spiritualist? for $1.50. Helen Gardener's Men, Women, and Gods is a work of great value, $1, as is Winwood Reade's Martyrdom of Man, $1 75; Gibbon's History of Christianity, $2; Darwin's Origin of Species and Descent of Man, and others of his works. A catalog containing these and hundreds more—Freethought, scientific, medical, social, as well as standard—will be sent on receipt of a request for same.

MR. PUTNAM will lecture the first four Sundays of January in San Francisco on "The Evolutions of a Century." Subject of first lecture, "Evolutions—Theological and Religious;" of second lecture, "Liberalism, Spiritualism, and Infidelity;" of third lecture, "Industrial Evolutions;" of fourth lecture, "Political Evolutions." January 29th there will be a grand Paine celebration at Union Square Hall. On the following Saturday and Sunday, January 30th and 31st, will be held the state convention.

President Schroeder to the Oregon Liberals.

TO THE MEMBERS OF THE OREGON STATE SECULAR UNION, GREETING: Our object should be to make our Union as effectiv an organization as possible. This can only be accomplished by thorough organization. We are banded together for a purpose. Our aim should be to accomplish that purpose. We must realize that we hav a duty to perform and should not shirk it.

A cause worthy of espousal is worthy of every assistance we can render it commensurate with our means and ability. We will accomplish little by meeting annually in convention unless it be for the purpose of discussing and perfecting plans for future work and devising ways and means to carry out those plans, making provisions for emergencies, and returning home with the full determination to do our part and solicit the aid and influence of every friend in our neighborhood, and especially inviting attention to our cause by encouraging discussion and distributing information relativ thereto.

We hav now met with an emergency which affects fundamental principles—the effort of Sunday closing at Portland. Portland is the heart of our state. If Portland is compelled to close on Sunday it will not be long before every town and hamlet in the state will be compelled to do likewise. Realizing the necessity of immediate action in this matter, and that a local committee would better serve the interests and purpose of our Union, I hav constituted Mrs. Sue R. Keenan, Mr. Rohrabaker, and Mr. Addis a vigilance committee to attend to the same. Mrs. Keenan is president or chairman of the committee. Mr. Addis has been appointed assistant secretary of our Union and is ex officio secretary of the committee.

Friend C. B. Reynolds, secretary of the Washington Secular Union, has kindly furnished us gratis three hundred copies of "Facts."

The Portland committee will distribute these where they will do the most good. I respectfully recommend that every county in the state organize on the same plan and therefore request each vice-president to call a meeting of the members of our Union in his county, and invite all others interested in the cause to affiliate. Elect a secretary and one other, who, with himself as ex-officio president, shall constitute a vigilance committee. The duties of this committee will be to watch the encroachments of our opponents and combat them if necessary, and if at any time the assistance of the Union be needed to report the same to the secretary, Mrs. Sarah C. Todd, Forest Grove, or to me, stating the nature of the case and such suggestions relativ thereto as in the opinion of the committee will best serve to secure success. These committees will hav supreme jurisdiction in the county for which they are appointed, in any move the executiv officers of the Union may decide to make, and shall solicit aid to help the Union in its work. They should report all their doings to the secretary, that a complete report of all work done may be made to the next convention; or if preferable, make a special or separate report direct to the convention and relieve the secretary of this labor. These reports may be made a happy feature of future conventions and we will all gain by one another's experience.

This plan may be further extended. The county committees may appoint sub-committees of one or more at each post-office in the county to help them in their work; better still, let each neighborhood select its own committee. This will create a greater interest. Every neighborhood will then hav a voice and share some of the responsibility.

I attribute the indifference and disinterestedness of Liberals principally to the fact that the work is not brought home to them. The further we extend our organization the more interest will be taken and the more practical and effectual will be our work.

I also wish to call attention to another important matter. Our last legislature ignored a petition of over ten thousand signatures asking for the repeal of our laws exempting church property from taxation. It is about time our political strength is felt. We must use our influence in the primaries and conventions to secure an "Equal Taxation, No Exemption" plank in the platforms, and see to it that men of sufficient stamina to stand by this principle are nominated and elected. The county committees may take this under advisement. There are several counties for which there has been no appointment of vice-president made. Our secretary was given authority to make these appointments. I request when vacancies occur the resident members of our Union either to elect or recommend some one for that position and notify the secretary.

I recommend the 29th day of January, Paine's birthday, as a very appropriate time to hold the meetings above suggested, and where practicable make the meetings interesting with a literary and musical entertainment free for all.

In conclusion allow me to admonish you to make all fights strictly on principle. Our cause is just; it must prevail. Yours fraternally,

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER, Heston, and your contributors are none too radical for me. Priestcraft is such balderdash that it does not deserve rational treatment. May THE TRUTH SEEKER liv to shatter its foundation, and compel the sky-pilots to earn their living in some useful way.

Certainly—Free Discussion Will Right Economics as It Is Righting Theology.

DEADWOOD, S. D., Dec. 12, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I see you are giving us some thoughts on the money question at times. That is right. No reform paper can ignore economics and be successful now. The time has come when people want to hear something pertaining to this life as well as, or more than, the improbable next. Money, transportation, and land questions are the issues that catch the thoughts of men now and will more so in the near future. Hoping you will get into the work, I remain,

Will Establish a Freethought Library.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., Dec. 8, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hav distributed ninety-odd of the one hundred copies you sent me. Whether you hav received new subscriptions or not from this quarter I know not, but, somehow or other, on close observation I find that there are thousands here who hunger for the light of truth. I am a perfect blunderer at soliciting, and thus it was hard for me to discover who was Liberal or not. I am planning an organization, and when I am ready one of the first moves will be to establish a Freethought library and subscribe to all such papers as the indomitable TRUTH SEEKER.

Yours in liberty, JOSEPH MAILLE.

Truly a Good Joke.

CHEMAWA, ORE., Dec. 7, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I hardly know how to begin this letter, as this is my first attempt. My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and we all like it the best of any paper we take. There was a crazy man escaped from the asylum at Salem about a week ago. He made his way about twelv miles down the Willamette river to a small burg called Wheatland. He went to church that evening. After prayer, he got up to preach them a sermon. Some of the good Christians shouted and took on and never knew the difference between him and the preacher till some outsider came to their rescue and told them the man was crazy. They took him back to Salem the next day. I thought this was a pretty good joke on the preachers and the church, so I thought I would tell you about it. Yours for truth, WILL BEATY.

Each Picture Should Make Priests Hide Their Faces.

HOOPER, UTAH, Nov. 30, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: I will write a word to the fearless, outspoken paper founded by the illustrious D. M. Bennett, and, I might say, truthfully run by you ever since his infamous imprisonment and death, caused by the notorious Anthony Comstock & Co. I think THE TRUTH SEEKER is as good today as ever. If there is any change it is better. Every illustration is a lesson that would cause every priest to hide his face and tongue in shame, had he not the cheek and impertinence of a brazen monkey.

I love the paper very much. I shall remain your and THE TRUTH SEEKER's friend as long as I liv, for it was some of its first numbers, and small ones at that, that led me from theological Christian darkness into the glorious light of truth as it is in science in this our day.

Yours fraternally, EDWARD F. MUNN.

The Unwondrous Wonder and the Unmagnetic Magnet.

LEAVENWORTH, KAN., Dec. 11, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: The Abbott discussion has been quite amusing. It takes all kinds of people to make a world. I witnessed a performance given by the Georgia Wonder (Hurst); I witnessed one given by the Georgia Magnet (Abbott) and participated in another by the same lady. I was fully satisfied—thoroughly convinced—that it was a matter of acquired skill and strength, but in order to convince some of my friends I not long since wrote to a gentleman with whom I was acquainted who traveled last season with the Abbott show. I hav his answer confirming my conclusion. He states explicitly that the show is a fake and a fraud when viewed in the calcium light of science and honesty, but that on business lines purely it is a good show and worth the money, and that Abbott and his wife are fine people. The moral which I seek to impress upon the minds of THE TRUTH SEEKER fraternity is this: Never bet on another person's game. If you do you will surely get left. Mrs. Abbott is a most sweet and charming little lady, and Mr. Abbott is a gentleman of polish and learning, and I hope every reader of this will see their "wonderful" show when opportunity offers. Myself and wife spent $4 on it and we do not regret it. Dr. Winship raised his lifting power from four hundred to three thousand pounds by "practice." Practice is a big word. "Practice makes perfect."

S. R. SHEPHERD.

Brazenly Intends to Langh at a Bible.

Dec. 12, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: In renewing my subscription with a "V," send me the book by Helen H. Gardener, "Is This Your Son, My Lord?" Take $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER. The other dollar will giv me that long-looked-for Pictorial Book, $1. I am a hearty chap at a laugh, and I think that will giv me a dose that will make my sides ache.

I do not think much of our pious Secular Union. I suggest we get some other kind of material for officers. I had rather hav Stevens's ghost or Samuel Putnam's old coat than all the pious cl'que in Philadelphia. I am in for showing no mercy toward superstition. The church and its holy followers hav not been very lavish in that article called mercy, and they will not get any from me as long as I can shout. Their impudence is amazing. Their ignorance is an established fact, and the indolence of the priest is a matter of history. The only science they can show is their faculty for lying.

You may put my name on the long list that demands the opening of the World's Fair on Sundays. "Bob" has done them up in good shape, and his voice is worth more than ten thousand signatures of these pious Polly-wants-a-cracker lads. They intend to ride there on a half-fare ticket and to enter the grounds free and then beat their board while they are there. These little Methodist boys think the Fair got up for them to hold a big camp meeting. But they are mistaken, as usual. Yours for justice, J. E. COY.

Catholics and Theosophists Lead Him a Sad Life.

FORT WAYNE, IND., Nov. 30, 1891

MR. EDITOR: I get THE TRUTH SEEKER each week at one of the news-stands here, and it is the only copy that comes here through that medium. I hav been trying during the past two months to get the newsdealer to keep an extra copy for sale, but without success so far, though I told him I would pay for it if not sold.

Catholics are very numerous here, both German and Irish, and most of the Liberal-minded people are deeply interested in Theosophy—another form of superstition. Annie Besant lectures here to-morrow evening. In an article published in the Press of this city, Mrs. Besant tells "How I Became a Theosophist," in which she speaks of "new truths." I do not possess one-eighth the learning of Mrs. Besant, and perhaps it is because of this fact that I cannot conceive of a "new" truth. According to my way of reasoning, there are no "new" truths, though there may be newly discovered truths. She also says: "And for the Freethinker to do this [referring to the stand taken by some of her Freethought critics] is to be false to his creed," while further on she says, "Freethought, in fact, is an intellectual state, not a creed" (italic mine). It seems to me that Mrs. Besant is becoming rather inconsistent in every respect. She says further, that if a person accepts Christianity after having once discarded it, it shows mental weakness (or words to that effect) Christianity and Theosophy are superstitions—at least, so I think. Mrs. Besant has turned from Freethought to accept a superstition. No comment is necessary.

Success to THE TRUTH SEEKER If I can be of service to you by distributing circulars, or anything of like nature, if you will send them I will do the best I can.

Yours for truth, F. G. BALL.

The Thinker.

LETCHER, COL., Dec. 1, 1891.

MR EDITOR: It is an old proverb that "he who increases knowledge, increaseth sorrow." Thoughts, like living things, are born. Their origin, or from whence they come, it is difficult to determin. The most plausible theory is that of the indestructibility of thoughts—that they are phonographed, so to speak, on the eth, or interior substance of the atmosphere, subject to a law of mental, or psychic, attraction from minds in search of the knowledge these thought-germs contain. Susceptible minds receive these as the earth does invisible seeds of plant life, when prepared to grow and mature them; the mystery of their lodgment and development being but little understood, but becoming plain to the unfolded perceptions.

The human-mind is beginning to ask questions as never before. The earth has been explored and made to answer, and to rectify the interrogation as to man's origin and its own development, in a way that none can successfully dispute. Were the minds of both men and women open to conviction and free to investigate, the whole world could be so changed in its ideas of civil, social, and religious institutions and the true ways of living, that soon it would become far superior to any fabled paradise. But now, when a bright thought strikes the mind, as a meteor does the earth, filled with the diamond dust of truth, it has often to lie hidden for long years ere it comes to light. A thought is matured by a process of mental gestation, and the trouble is when it is born into the world it is met by ignorance and superstition; especially if it is of a nature to overthrow or change these conditions, as there are always Herods to seek the young child's life. The world can make no progress without the thinker and his thought. As well expect to run an engin without steam or other power.

The best way for the thinker to do is to prove his thoughts to be truth, then fearlessly and freely speak them for the benefit of the world.

The trouble with new and advanced ideas is, that they are compelled to run in old ruts of worn-out paths wherein they are soon changed by the rude contact of the old. The thinker must pave the way for new thoughts and should be free to make improvements upon the hedged-up ways of progress. A free press is the power to overcome all obstacles, and what we most need are more Liberal-minded, fearless editors to help guide and form public sentiment.

L. HUTCHINSON.

Some of His Tracts Meet the Auto-da-fe.

UKIAH, CAL., Nov. 8, 291.

MR. EDITOR: Seeing you offer free sample pages—pictures and text—of the "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book," if you will take the trouble to forward the same to me, I will try to distribute to the best advantage. For some ten years past, while taking the Boston Investigator, at each annual renewal of subscription I hav made it a point to accompany it with a small remittance for pamphlets and tracts, which I carry in my pockets as missionary ammunition to be handed to this one or that. On the more important ones I write, "Please return when called for." This opens the door for a little discussion or remarks at the second meeting, and rather indemnifies the little "intruder" from the Auto dâ fé, although it occasionally fails to prevent this calamity. As you may be aware, our beautiful mountain town of Ukiah is subject to fiery freaks and occasionally gets on the Sodomitish warpath at the advent of Freethinkers' visits. However, send me a few specimens and I will see what I can do.

I came near forgetting to tell you we hav been favored for a month past with a couple of Salvation lassies—quite good-looking, rather young ladies. They are holding forth nightly in the upper story of our old Methodist Episcopal church building, with crowded audiences; and good lively singing and tambourine accompaniment, and young and old joining in the chorus, make quite lively pastime a substitute for theatricals; therefore our young folks enjoy it hugely. The audiences are always forcibly reminded of the cheerful giver, therefore the evening contributions are from $2 to $4, making from $20 to $25 or $30 per week, so they must be making a pretty fair living—and of course a good deal better than doing worse, although they might engage in some other branch more worthy of their time and of substantial benefit to the community. But such is life, and these young ladies hav just the same right to get their living in this line as the most talented divine with his $10,000 or $20,000 a year. They labor more persistently and apparently as sincerely as the most popular preachers of the day. While holding forth one evening in the the street in front of a meat-shop a wag stole in and sprung the sausage-grinder, with a tearing and rattling like the falling walls of Jericho, operating like a thunderbolt, with an instant stampede of the Army as fast as their limbs could carry them, unhappily forgetting they were in the radius of the hand of the almighty and that the righteous are never forsaken. Yours respectfully, THOS. MCCOWEN.

Philosophical Musings.

LEXINGTON, KY., Dec. 13, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Can we say that we are without hope in the world when we hav Colonel Ingersoll's "Mr. C." to cheer us? He would not seize the lion's share; he would divide his profits with the laborer. We hav also the "Emancipation of Women," by Mrs. Fawcett, in the Fortnightly for November. These are rays of sunlight which shall gild future scenes; not a mist called God, which is the baseless fabric of a vision.

There is rich dust enough in the universe to cause a wise cell to sprout beside an inferior one. Good brain material did not come from God; the process is too slow to hazard such a conjecture. People who lag along transmit no thoughtful proclivities to their children, for nerve must be shaken up as well as muscle. If there was a God, such lovely sprays of being would appear, because atoms never stand still. Strange, lawless, Ariel music, with lovely, fragrant, impossible buds, would awaken in every shade. Nature deified and ennobled would be God, for mentality could not exist without experience of mistakes corrected, which is true progress. A great God is a great conflict, not like a certain old woman or human sponge, who does nothing but eat, backbite, and talk of heaven. Spiritualists are reaching up to such a deity, for I think they talk no more of materializing (kind heaven!). Presumptiv evidence, like circumstantial, hangs the innocent, but cannot create a full-blooded God. Clergymen are preaching splendidly of the "infinit wisdom" of this vagary of being, but the great Hegel only hints at a proceeding influence, alternately passing through space and retreating to its own nature, although medical men, psalm-singers, and soothsayers may hav a different opinion. The progressiv Dr. Griffiss, of Boston, remarks that the great renaissance of Queen Elizabeth's time was heathenish. I am glad of it. Farewell to a creed outworn—election and total depravity. Rather giv us Bacon's deep thoughts and Shakspere's sweet musings like "Triton winding his enwreathed horn."

But to return to the infinit wisdom of God. "And all his failings leaned on mercy's side." Which, Jehovah or Jupiter? Jehovah was a warlike God; his people spent their time in bloodshed and licentiousness. Jupiter was more refined and peaceable. Under his rule the fine arts exalted the minds of men and softened their manners. I hav an engraving of an exquisit statue of Hermes, the protector of orphans. A forlorn infant is clinging to his shoulder.

"The divine and infinit wisdom of God" causes helpless young women to be ruined and disgraced. Need I say more? ALHAZA.

A Lady's Sharp Words to the Deceivers.

BEEBE, ARK., Dec. 8, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Please mail to my address the free sample pages—pictures and text—of the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book," and I will gladly distribute them. I will do my utmost to make sale of some copies. Something of the kind is sadly needed in this church-ridden community. There are seven churches here—two black and five white joss-houses. A more ignorant, superstitious lot, of Methodists in particular, you will not find anywhere. There are about sixty Liberalists here now. When we came here three years ago, there was but one in the town—a dentist, who had a hard row to hoe all alone. One of our number died last month, and remained stanch to the last. He passed away like the true hero he was. He would not accept the proffered religious services of the Methodist Episcopal parson, or "Jesus pigeon." We Infidels gave him an Infidel burial. The dentist read a part of Graves's "True Religion" over his grave. No prayer was said nor hymn was sung. A Methodist spectator remarked that it was the poorest funeral he ever witnessed. To which our dentist replied that "it was none of his funeral." The Methodists of this state are the most aggressiv of any denomination. They would like to hav the old Blue laws of Connecticut reëstablished again. They come out of the canebrakes and swamps and pass right into the pulpits, and begin to slaughter the English language without mercy. If a Liberal lecturer would come here, I am sure we could raise enough from among the Infidels alone to pay him any moderate compensation. Will not some one write me concerning an appointment, and I will see what can be done? The seed has been sown here. Who will help me in the good work? Let everyone who reads this letter send me any Liberal literature that they can spare, for distribution. Just think, the Campbellite minister here said he would rather be an Infidel than be a Methodist. That shows how they are despised even by their own class of parasites. The following verses express pretty freely what I think of them. Do not forget the samples. I am almost sure I can sell some copies.

Yours fraternally, MRS. ED. ABBEY.

TO THE METHODIST CLERGY.

Hav done, you human parasite,
You devil-fish without a soul.
Too long you've fed on human flesh,
Abetted by your pious fold.
Insatiate is your holy greed;
With open mouth you swallow all.
To rob by lies is all your creed—
A "blowing" viper as you crawl.
Your long-drawn visage makes one laugh;
For we can read your saintly pangs
When from the sting of scorn you chaff,
And men do see your poison fangs.
Your voice, a bass barometer,
By which your flocks do watch the signs
Of coming storm in long-meter,
That terrifies their simple minds.
The "soul's physician," if you will—
But from such bleeding save us, Moses.
And as we do not need your pills,
Excuse us from your hell-fire doses.
Your pious drawl, "The Lord bless thee,"
Is your exchange in trade, your stock.
For all the world can plainly see
You wear the bell and lead the flock.
You wrestle hard with sin, no doubt,
But Satan beats you in the strife.
For with the funds you will skip out
And take along the deacon's wife,
Who hopes to hang on your coat-tails
When called to take the upper route.
But all regardless of her wails,
You will ascend in roundabout.
To catch "the fair" you labor most;
Yea, verily, then haste to teach her
'Bout Mary and the Holy Ghost,
Whose earthly name was, Reverend Beecher.

Some Election Tactics.

Dec. 3, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: In every town and city of any importance in Kansas I presume this scheme was practiced. What they are pleased to call a committee sent out by the Republicans—but I call them a gang of political brigands—waited upon business men who were known to favor the People's party and said, "You don't want to vote against your own best interests, and if you do you can't do business in this town." I know three instances of this kind, and the returns are not all in yet. But did they really mean a boycott? Yes. The same three were boycotted. I would giv their names, but I do not think it fair to advertise one friend's business and not another's. But suffice it to say, one was a barber and the other two were merchants. After boycotting the barber they taunted him by asking, "Well, how many farmers did you shave to-day?" One of the merchants kept a bakery and the day after election of course he sent out the usual amount that it had taken to supply his trade, and there was brought back $25 worth, the greater portion of which spoiled on his hands. The only reason I could assign why he did not sell his usual amount is that the townspeople got so full on the day of election that they did not want anything more for a week—either that or a straight-out boycott. The other merchant had been getting a portion of his goods at wholesale houses on time, but a committee either waited upon or wrote them that the aforesaid party was insolvent and it was not safe to let him hav any more goods without the cash accompanying the order. I had a good chance to test the truthfulness of the last case. I went to him and wanted to buy a certain brand of soap, but he did not keep it in stock, and after finding out the wholesale price he and I agreed upon the price I was to pay for it, and then he gave me an order, the money accompanying it, at retail price, and sent me to the wholesale house after the soap, which would leave a balance to his credit, showing that he had been getting goods on time, and was still owing them. And to test then whether his credit was still good, I presented the order and asked them to point me out the soap, but a fellow that I presented the order to went to the manager and said something, to which he shook his head in the negativ, whereupon I began to reach down in my pocket. Then he said low to the manager, "I guess he is a-going to pay for it," and I counted him out the money and got the soap. Now, then, I think it wrong to boycott, and I also think it wrong to murder, but either is justifiable in self-defense. But whom will we boycott? Now, there could not be a very effectiv boycott without its being given out officially by some organization. So it is plain the persons above-mentioned were dealt with by a well-organized boycott. Now, in self-defense the question arises, Had we, the Alliance, better make an official boycott against all dealers not friendly to our order, or let each individual do as he pleases in regard to the matter? We know that it injured the Knights of Labor by declaring an official boycott, but they could not come at us because we are in no way dependent on them, whereas the Knights of Labor are generally dependent upon the cities for employment.

Where was this base conspiracy hatched? It was hatched, fathered, and nurtured by the Young Men's Christian Association and the church, and aped by the Republican League. "It is the progenitor of discord, hatred, and bitterness; the instigator of contention, enmity, and rancor, and the propagator of strife, dissension, and violence. It is a base conspiracy of raving cranks, frothing fanatics, gibbering lunatics, frenzied bigots, designing knaves, rotten demagogs, and unprincipled politicians who would apply the torch of conflagration to the glorious temple of liberty bequeathed us by our fathers, and dance in fiendish revelry around the smoking ruin." And this by the party of "great moral ideas" who preach a "full ballot and fair count." Ought they not to hav been satisfied with their boodle to buy votes, whisky, and treacherous, traitorous editors to write editorials on the eve of election against pensioning the soldier? Would not any reasonable man think that was going far enough for a Prohibition and a God and morality party? The fellows who delight to be called "Honorable" and hold the offices engineer these schemes, and hand them over to the dupes, tools, and puppets of the order to be executed by those who hav not an honest, original idea of their own, while they would be ashamed to hav it known that they had anything to do with anything so low and mean. Hav others no rights that they are bound to respect? Let me ask this great question, What is a ward politician? He is unprincipled, a gambler, a boodler, a beer-guzzler, a whisky-drinker, a defaulter, a conceited simpleton, who has a mania for showing off at every election. The ward politician must go.

My plan would be in all cases to come right out and tell the public, especially of any of our opponents' unfairness, because the public generally has a great love for justice and fair play.

Our mission is to educate the people so that the boodle and whisky politician cannot vote the ignorant at will. I am willing to trust the man of settled convictions of doing his duty. And then the other fellows will find that "Othello's occupation's gone."

I would suggest that our national committee, and so on down to the state and county, should issue a warning to all persons that undertake to carry an election otherwise than by fair means that such persons will be closely watched, and that we will inflict such punishment as an outraged people hav within their power, and I think that if we giv them a little foretaste, which some of us are determined to do, they will think twice before they act once. And if they still insist on making the election of a sovereign people a farce, the first thing they will know will be that a cyclone has struck them, and they will wish that they had emigrated to some monarchical government where they justly belong.

JOHN W. ABBOTT.

Showing How Much Christians Know About Freethinkers.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Dec. 5, 1891.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed a copy of an article I sent the Item, edited in this city, which was returned with a short but implicit refusal to publish the same:

JOSH BILLINGS ON INFIDELITY.

Did you ever hear of a man's renouncing Christianity on hiz death-bed and turning Infidel?

Gamblers nor Freethinkers havn't faith enuff in their profession to teach it to their children.

No Atheist, with all his boasted bravery, has ever yet dared to advertise hiz unbelief on his tum-stun.

I notiss one thing: when a man gits into a tite spot he don't never send for his friend, the devil, to get him out.

I had rather be an ideot than an Infidel; if I am an Infidel, I hav made myself one, if an ideot, I wuz made so.

I never hav met a Freethinker yet who didn't believe a hundred times more nonsense than he kan find in the Bible ennywhere.

It is alluss safe to follow the religious beleaf that our mothers taught us—there never was a mother yet who taught her child to be an Infidel.

A man may learn Infidelity from books, and from his assosshiates, but he kant learn it from his mother nor the works that surround him.

Unbelievers are allus so reddy and anxious to prove their unbeleaf, that I hav thought they mite be just a leetle doubtful about it themselvs.

The Infidel in his impurdence will prove to yu that the flood did not occur, when the poor ideot himself kant prove, to save his life, what makes one apple sweet and one sour, er tell whi a hen's egg iz white er a duck's egg blue.

When I hear a noisy Infidel proklaiming hiz unbelief, I wonder if he will send for some brother Infidel to cum see him die? I guess not. He will be more likely to send for the orthodox man who engineers the little brick church just around the korner.—Ram's Horn.

Now, this paper published this article, upon which I wrote a few criticisms, and they refused to hav anything to do with the other side of the question (Freethinker's), but at the same time it devotes column after column to dedications of Romish churches, consecrations of Romish bishops, edits full accounts of all Roman Catholic miracles, and all such silly trash as the location of hell, but refuses to hav anything to do with a Freethinking article. This paper is more commonly known among the newsboys as the Bladder, and in my opinion it is rightly named.

By their refusal to publish my article, it shows what a hold the churches hav to hold the muzzle upon the press, and some people say the press is untrammeled by any church. The article was written by Josh Billings, now deceased, entitled "Infidelity." I wrote my criticisms in the same person as if Josh was alive, so as to compare with his grammatically. I append my article containing my criticisms. Yours respectfully, GEORGE M. FRINK.

Josh starts out saying:

"Did you ever hear of a man's renouncing Christianity on his death-bed and turning Infidel?"

If any such thing occurs it is never brought to light, if a Christian can suppress it, for it would damage the cause of Christ, and is therefore promptly suppressed by the fanatics, and no newspaper would dare to make any comment upon the same for fear of the pious indignation raised by bigots.

"Gamblers nor Freethinkers han't faith enuff in their profession to teach it to their children."

Gamblers and Freethinkers classed together; this, I suppose, is a sample of Josh's religious tolerance. A man who has not faith enough in his own honest convictions to teach the same to his children is not a Freethinker but a hypocrit, and not worthy of the name of man.

"No Atheist, with all his boasted bravery, has ever yet dared to advertize his unbelief on his tum-stun."

I would recommend him to the monuments of D. M. Bennett and Horace Seaver, who were both editors of Freethought journals, and let him see for himself. The cemeteries would hav quite a few, if they were allowed to expect the same, but they are forbidden, for Christ Jesus's sake, and well Josh knows it.

"I notiss one thing, when a man g'ts into a tite spot, he don't never send for his friend, the devil, to get him out."

The Infidel or Freethinker neither believes in nor has any use for a devil. The whole Christian church is founded on the theory of a hell and a devil; without this, the church theory would not stand ten minutes; therefore the devil (Christian) is the Christian's best friend, not the Infidel's. Josh intimates that the Freethinker would call upon his God (whoever or whatever that is) to help him out. He could not do that even, for while a Freethinker or Infidel does not deny there is a God, he does not believe in one.

"I would rather be an ideot than an Infidel; if I am an Infidel, I hav made myself one; if I am an ideot, I was made so."

I am glad to see Josh would rather associate with those he is best fitted to judge—idiots. An idiot could not be an Infidel; it requires brains. A man can no more help being an Infidel than he could help being born. God makes idiots, according to Josh's ideas, and I hav no use for a God that will create such beings, but would hav every respect for one that creates beings with brains enough to think for themselvs, if I believed in a God.

"I never hav met a Freethinker yet who didn't believe a hundred times more nonsense than he kan find in the Bible ennywhere."

In the name of common sense where can one read more nonsense to the square inch than in the holy Bible? Evolution, astronomy, zoölogy, geology, and all the different sciences, are to the great and only Josh "nonsense." There is none so blind as those who will not see.

"It is allus safe to follow the religious belief that our mothers taught us. There never was a mother yet who taught her child to be an Infidel."

Here, again, Josh is wrong. I know of several mothers who at the present time are teaching their children Freethought and Infidelity. Josh does not believe in Mohammedanism, yet he says it is safe for those children whose mothers embrace that system to follow it; and as a Christian he aids in making Infidels according to the Mohammedan idea, by helping to send missionaries to convert them into Christianity.

The venerable Josh is not consistent.

"A man may learn Infidelity from books and from his assosshiates, but he kant learn it from his mother, nor the works that surround him."

By investigating the works that surround us, Infidelity had its birth, and by the complete understanding of the laws of nature, the religions of to-day will meet their death. How did the man who wrote books on Infidelity gain knowledge in the same? From his associates? If so, how did his associates gain that knowledge? and ad infinitum? The best book I know of to make Infidels is the holy writ? (wrot).

"Unbelievers are alluss so reddy and anxious to prove their unbeleaf, that I hav thought they mite be just a leetle doubtful about it themselvs."

I wonder if Josh can tell positivly just what he believes in. If he can, he can do more than any man I ever met.

"The Infidel in his impurdence will prove to you that the flood did not occur, when the poor ideot kant prove to save his life what makes one apple sweet and one sour, er tell whi a hen's egg is white er a duck's egg blue."

Proof, conclusiv proof in geology that the flood did not occur is too abundant for any comment; and if a person is an "ideot," how can anyone expect him to go into scientific demonstrations to prove why a sweet apple is not sour, and a white egg blue and vice versa? Let Josh pray to his God and let scientists work out an analysis of the same, and see who comes to a sensible conclusion first.

"When I hear a noisy Infidel proklaiming hiz unbeleaf, I wonder if he will send for some brother Infidel to cum see him die. I guess not. He will be more likely to send for the orthodox man who engineers the little brick church around the corner."

Whenever I hear a "believe or be damned" blatherskite sky-pilot preaching hell-fire and brimstone and a place called heaven, of which he knows absolutely nothing, it always makes me think, will he preach hell-fire to a dying parishioner? I guess not. He will tell him he is going straight to heaven to sleep (?) on the bosom of Jesus. Every one who does not think or believe just as the pious Josh does is an idiot for not believing that nine-tenths of all mankind are going to be eternally sizzled, for the edification of the righteous (?), for not believing in a man-made God and a silly lot of nonsensical nonsense of ignorant men who lived in the dark ages of the world. Great thing, this Christianity, but I will none of it.

Yours courteously, GEORGE M. FRINK.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Old Santa Come to Stay.

Who is old Santa, papa,
That far in the night
Drives so hard his pretty reindeers,
Foaming, almost flying,
Panting, as from fright?
And we lie awake to see them,
Listening for the bells as they pass,
With the sleigh, eight reindeers tandem,
And we miss the pretty sight.
Last night I thought to watch him;
So I made a peep-hole in the glass,
Breathed the frost off the window,
With my fingers rubbed it bright.
Little sister was beside me; not a doubt
But we would surely see him.
Yet a fear came o'er me; the room seemed very cold,
For the fire in the grate had gone out,
And old Santa comes in by the chimney we are told.

In our night-clothes by the window,
Through the peep-hole we looked and listened.
Like the diamonds in the snow,
Nellie's eyes, how they sparkled, glistened.
While we listened not a word was uttered,
For fear we should miss the tinkle of the bells.

In our bare feet on the carpet—
For our stockings on the mantle,
In expectancy, we'd hung—
In the cold we stood and shivered,
Waited, watched, and listened
For the bells that never rung.

Close upon my breast
Nellie's curly head was nestled,
And her chin did quiver,
Tremble, shiver with the cold,
While her eyes grew dark and deep.
She grew tired of watching, listening,
Tired, sad, and weary, and she fell asleep.

Then I raised her up so gently,
And I started to the bed,
Tiptoeing o'er the carpet,
As the night had nearly fled.
And my head
Jostled up the pendants of the lamp,
As they mingled, thus they tingled,
And they jingled as the bells.

Up roused my little sleeper,
And she tells—
"O! he is a tummin', brover Willie,
Tamp, tamp, tamp,
Hear de yeandeer wiv der hoofs,
O, de bells, bells, bells!"

Wild in glee she clasped her hands;
Then she threw them up to pat them,
Then around my neck her arms,
As she hugged and kissed me.
"Dear old Santa, I dess love oo, bet I do,"
And slumber then again crept o'er her.
As her loving arms relaxed,
Across my face the soft hand wandered,
While she murmured—faintly whispered—
"Where is oo whiskers, Santa?
Why oo tut 'em off!"

Then to our bed I bore her,
And I trembled, huddled, nestled,
To get warm. In my brain it wrestled,
And the tiny form beside me
Was still dreaming of old Santa.
In her murmur she did say,
"Is oo tummin' here to liv?
It would be so nice and joily if oo do—
If oo dess would tum and stay."

In that last murmured "papa,"
My misgivings she expressed—
Is it all a superstition and a jest?
Somehow it seems so empty,
And children need a Santa every day,
Not for nuts and sweetmeats,
But to brush their little hurts away.

Let us hav our Santas all the year,
And to our mammas and our papas
Giv the love we giv to him.
Don't you think 'twould make all better,
To be loving while we're growing?
And to overcome the fear
Of provoking or offending
For a long and dreary year?

All night I thought about it,
And I reasoned o'er and o'er.
Oh, let me tell to little Nell,
For it cannot break the spell
Of her dream—Oh, it's true,
Nellie darling, waken,
Brush the tear away,
Listen to the news I tell you,
Santa's come, and has come to stay.

Reader, there are millions of these little hearts awaiting,
Throbbing, breaking, straining in their tension,
For such comforts as they may.
Let us hav our human Santas—
Hav them with us every day.

UNCLE JACK.

To Our Friends, Both Young and Old.

We take this opportunity to thank our friends and correspondents for their generous favors during the past year.

To all who hav helped by their contributions to make the Corner interesting and instructiv we would say that we are deeply grateful for their kindness and solicit a continuance of the same. Our family in the Corner is a large, interesting, and growing one.

Year by year its needs are greater and more imperativ. More and more we see the necessity of a larger Corner for the little ones. We need more space for scientific, historical, and interesting studies. "Just as the twig is bent the tree's inclined," and, if we would hav a nation of fair-minded, intellectual, Liberal men and women, we must begin their training in that direction when they are young—the sooner the better.

Freethinkers of this country need as much, or more, than anything else, a paper for the young, for their good especially—a strong, lively, wide-awake journal devoted to their interest.

Capital is needed for such an undertaking. There would be little use to start without it, for failure in such an undertaking would be most disastrous. The editor of the Corner hopes that some generous-hearted individual may, erelong, see the necessity of caring for the children in this way and provide for it. May the good time soon come, but, soon or late, it will be welcome whenever it may arrive.

With these few thoughts at the close of the year, we wish, not only our children, but everybody, health, happiness, success, and prosperity, not alone for the coming year, but for all succeeding years. ED. C. C.

The Wonders of an Egg.

Everyone who eats an egg eats a sermon and a miracle. Inside of that smooth, symmetrical, beautiful shell lurks a question which has been the Troy town for all the philosophers and scientists since Adam. Armed with the engins of war—the microscope, the scales, the offensiv weapons of chemistry, and reason—they hav probed, and weighed, and experimented, and still the question is unsolved, the citadel unsacked. Professor Bokorny can tell you that albumen is composed of so many molecules of carbon, and nitrogen, and hydrogen, and can persuade you of the difference between activ and pasiv albumen, and can show by wonderfully delicate experiments what the aldehydes hav to do in the separation of gold from the complicated solutions; but he can't tell you why from one egg comes a "little rid hin," and from another a bantam.

You leave your silver spoon an hour in your egg-cup and it is coated with a compound of sulphur. Why is that sulphur there? Wonderful that evolution should provide for the bones of the future hen. There is phosphorus also in that little microcosm, and the oxygen of the air, passing through the shell, unites with it, and the acid dissolves the shell, thus making good, strong bones for the chick, and at the same time thinning the prison walls Chemists know a good deal now about albumen, and if they cannot tell us why life differentiates itself therein and thereby, they can tell you how not to spoil your breakfast by overdoing your egg.

Training a Boy.

I am writing the scrappy sort of letter which is particularly obnoxious to the soul of the editor, says Arlo Bates in the Providence Journal, and therefore take occasion to tuck in a story with a moral, which was told the other day in a discussion on the training of children. A gentleman who is regarded as eccentric by the more conventional of his acquaintances, and whose management of his son, a lad of some seven summers, is especially amazing to the gossips, returned home the other evening to be met with the news that the boy had cut a hole in the drawing-room sofa.

"Well, my son," the father said, after being informed by the lad that he had done the damage under the pressure of an irresistible desire, such as is usually the plea of children in similar circumstances, "I am very sorry that you should spoil my sofa. I hav just paid seventy-five dollars to hav it recovered, and I cannot afford to hav that done over again. The only thing I can see is for you to sit on that cut place when anybody is here, so as to cover it. I know you don't like company very well, but I know your mother would be ashamed to hav callers see that hole."

The small boy knew his father too well to protest, and, indeed, for the moment, he was probably only too happy to get off so easily. When, however, he had been summoned to sit on that cut two or three times things wore a different aspect. He heard the door-bell ring with apprehension, and when he was called for to run to the drawing-room he burst into wailing and weeping so violently that his presence had to be dispensed with.

"Now, my son," his father said to him, "I did not make any fuss when you cut my new sofa covering, and I can't allow you to make a fuss about bearing the consequences of what you did to please yourself."

The poor little wretch was reduced to a condition of despair pitiful to behold, when his father said to him:

"Now, Willis, I am going to make a proposition to you. You may do just as you please about it. I promised you a soldier's uniform at Christmas; now, if you had rather I took that money and had the sofa mended, I will put enough with it to get the thing done."

The lad chose to hav the sofa mended, and at Christmas he bore his disappointment like his father's son. He did hav, it is only fair to his father to add, a good deal in the way of alleviations of one sort and another.

Corner Gospel.

NO ROYAL ROAD TO KNOWLEDGE.

You cannot acquire knowledge but by special effort. It matters not, prince or peasant alike must dig and delve for the golden ore of learning. Money can put many things in your hands, but it cannot instill knowledge in your brain. That comes by trying. Over and over must the lesson be conned, thought exercised, and the reasoning faculties be duly used if one would gain an entrance to the fields of science. Knowledge is power. It is strength to the weak. It is true royalty. He is a king who has knowledge and wisdom to apply it. The earth is a great schoolbook. Its pages open to the earnest seeker after light. It offers a feast to all, rich and poor, lowly and lofty, precisely the same.

When a king asked Euclid, the mathematician, whether he could not explain his art to him in an easier manner, he was answered that there was "no royal road to geometry." Other things may be seized by might or purchased with money, but knowledge is to be gained by study, and study is to be prosecuted only in retirement.

The wise person will improve the present hour. Its wings are of wind, and when once gone it comes not back. Store its flying minutes with the honey of knowledge, is the admonition to all. S. H. W.

An Ingenious Schoolboy.

An ingenious English schoolboy, who wanted an answer to an arithmetical problem, dropped into a grocer's store on his way to school and said he wanted certain commodities at certain prices. After exhausting his list he said: "Now if I giv you a half sovereign, what change shall I get back?" The grocer told him, whereat he thanked the shopman and turned to go. "Wait for the things," called the grocer; and his disgust can be imagined when the urchin told him he was late for school, and, as he hadn't learned his arithmetic lesson, he had adopted that method of getting the problem worked for him.—Exchange.

Thanks to Lora Flick.

Lora Flick will please accept thanks for beautiful specimen of moss and a lovely agate. ED. C. C.

Correspondence.

CONCORDIA, KAN., Dec. 9, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write to the Children's Corner in order that its readers may know there is another Freethinker growing up. Pa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. I like to read the Corner, and also enjoy looking at the pictures. I am twelv years of age. I go to school. I like my teacher very well. Her name is Miss Garfer; she is a Christian and opens school every morning by reading a chapter from a book that teaches a flat and four-cornered earth. That may be right, but it doesn't correspond with my geography. I hav six studies, reading, writing, spelling, geography, arithmetic, and history. I hav a brother nine years of age; his name is Roy. He will write to the Corner some time. I will close with best wishes for the Corner. I will write again if this escapes the waste-basket. From your Liberal friend,

GEORGE BOWLING.

[Another bright boy added to our family. Welcome.—ED. C. C.]

BALTIMORE, MD., Dec. 15, 1891.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I am ten years old and this is my first letter to the Corner. There are letters in the Corner that I like very much. Papa takes THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator. We enjoy both papers. We hav been here three months and hav not made the acquaintance of a Liberal family yet. There appear not to be many Liberals in Baltimore. Papa was here three weeks before he found one.

Perhaps I am taking up too much of your time, so I will close, wishing you and your little correspondents a Merry Christmas and Happy New Year.

Sincerely, EDWIN R. FRIEND.

[We are pleased to welcome Edwin and hope to hear from him often. A big city like Baltimore ought to contain many Liberals. We trust some of them will take the trouble to find the new-comers and be sociable. It is lonely to be strangers in a large city, with none of our own way of thinking to speak to.—ED. C. C.]

D. M. BENNETT'S WORKS.

ADDRESS THE TRUTH SEEKER OFFICE.

A Truth Seeker Around the World. Four large volumes. With a steel-plate engraving of the author in Vol. I., and each volume illustrated with forty-seven cuts. Handsomely bound in red cloth, $6.50; in leather, red edges, $9.50; in morocco, gilt edges, $10.50.

The Champions of the Church; Their Crimes and Persecutions. 8vo. 1,119 pages. Cloth, $3.00; leather, $4.00; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Gods and Religions of Ancient and Modern Times. Two Volumes. Written in prison. In cloth, $3.00 per volume, or $5.00 for the two volumes; in leather, $7.00; in morocco, gilt edges, $8.00.

From Behind the Bars. A series of letters written in prison. Over 700 pages. Price $1.50.

A Truth Seeker in Europe. A series of letters written during a visit of ten weeks in Europe. Giving some account of the International Freethinkers' Congress held at Brussels, to which Mr. Bennett was a delegate, followed by a description of what he saw in England, France, Holland, and Italy. The letters from Rome alone are worth the price of the book. With a steel-plate portrait of the author. 850 pages. $1.50.

The Semitic Gods and the Bible. Treating upon the gods of the Semitic nations, including Allah, Jehovah, Satan, the Holy Ghost, Jesus Christ, the Virgin Mary, and the Bible. To the latter 230 pages are devoted, showing that book to be a very inferior production for a first-class God. 333 large pages. Paper covers, 60 cents; cloth, $1.

Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism examined historically and critically. It is thought to be the most damaging exhibit of Christianity that has appeared. 500 large pages. Price, $1.50.

Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories, Essays, and Lectures. 700 pages. Paper covers, 75 cents;

The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion. A debate on Christianity and Infidelity, between D. M. BENNETT and Rev. G. H. HUMPHREY. This book has had a very large sale, and is a splendid work for Freethinkers to loan to Christian neighbors. 550 pages. Price, $1.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attentior of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

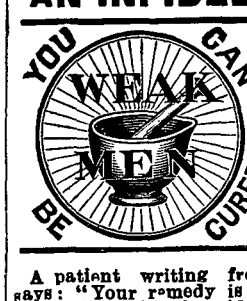
DONALD KENNEDY

Of Roxbury, Mass., Says:



Strange cases cured by my MEDICAL DISCOVERY come to me every day. Here is one of Paralysis—Blindness—and the Grip. Now how does my MEDICAL DISCOVERY cure all these? I don't know, unless it takes hold of the Hidden Poison that makes all Humor.

VIRGINIA CITY, NEVADA, Sept. 9th, 1891.

Donald Kennedy—Dear Sir: I will state my case to you: About nine years ago I was paralyzed in my left side, and the best doctors gave me no relief for two years, and I was advised to try your DISCOVERY, which did its duty, and in a few months I was restored to health. About four years ago I became blind in my left eye by a spotted cataract. Last March I was taken with La Grippe, and was confined to my bed for three months. At the end of that time, as in the start, then it struck me that your DISCOVERY was the thing for me; so I got a bottle, and before it was half gone I was able to go to my work in the mines. Now in regard to my eyes, as I lost my left eye, and about six months ago my right eye became affected with black spots over the sight as did the left eye—perhaps some twenty of them—but since I have been using your DISCOVERY they all left my right eye but one; and, thank God, the bright light of heaven is once more making its appearance in my left eye. I am wonderfully astonished at it, and thank God and your MEDICAL DISCOVERY.

Yours truly, HANK WHITE.

News of the Week.

DEPEW says that if Blaine wishes he will get the presidential nomination; if he does not wish it, Harrison will get it.

IN the Cork riots one of the priests fighting on the McCarthyite side knocked down and badly hurt a Parnellite, and then, as the latter was thought dying, kneeled and administered the last rites of religion.

HENRY REQUA hanged himself on the 16th. He, like his mother, had religious mania. He was activ in Sunday-school work. On the morning of the 16th he visited Rev. Dr. Bourne and said, "There is no redemption for me." He could not be reassured, but left despondent.

THE German government district of Wiesbaden has drawn up regulations for "preventing injuries to health resulting from circumcision." Persons desirous of circumcision must obtain a certificate from the royal district physician. The method of operation is minutely prescribed.

JOHN W. MACK, a madman, was ignorantly released from Bethany Home, a "Divine Healing" institution, and went to Bolivar, Pa., on the night of the 9th and murdered a married couple, and was beating in a door to kill the three children and grandmother when overpowered.

EX-PRIEST GREGOIRE is meeting great difficulty in delivering his lecture, "Why I Left the Church of Rome," at Montreal. On one occasion the church was partly wrecked and people were injured by stones, police clubs, and crushing and stifling. The reserves from six police stations were unable to quell the rioters till reinforced by Protestant students from Bishop's University.

LAST Sunday during services at St. Mary's Anglican church at Newry, Ireland, eleven vestrymen advanced to the altar and seized the communion cloth. The rector also seized it, and both sides tugged and scuffled till the vestrymen got it, when they cut off and burnt the lettering "I. H. S.," to which they had long objected. Police were summoned and took their names for prosecution.

ON the 15th a young man in Berlin imitated Russell Sage's assailant. He demanded of Banker Hermann ten thousand marks on pain of instant destruction by dynamite. Mr. Hermann called loudly for help to arrest the man, who fled but was caught. He had on him gunpowder and a white powder of unknown nature. His identity is unknown.

CHARLES HENRY WILLIAM HOGG, a crank, has been arrested at Washington for annoying President Harrison. He is lately from Homestead, Pa., where he had visited all the clergymen and said that society is on a wrong basis and can be reconstructed only by a new church which he proposed. He was to be head and all who helped were to be saints.

ERNST JACKSON, who represents the New York Bible Society at the Barge Office, gave a Bible to Barbette Weimann, a German girl, who landed from the steamship Trave. Father Geyer, in charge of the Leo Haus, on State street, an institution for German immigrant girls of Catholic faith, took the Bible from Barbette when he learned that she was a Catholic. Jackson resented the interference, and in the quarrel that followed the clerical gentlemen all but came to blows. Pastor Simons, a Methodist missionary, took a hand on Jackson's side. Father Geyer refused to giv up the Bible, and, but for Landing Superintendent John Simpson, there would hav been trouble.

A MEETING of the Maharastra Hindoos was held recently in the Thakordwar temple, Bombay, to consider what steps should be taken in protest against certain libelous handbills distributed among the natives by Christian missionaries. The chairman, Mr. Dhondu Shamrao Garud, said that handbills bearing a gross libel of the great Hindoo god Krishna had been circulated by the Bible Tract Society. A slur was cast on their god Krishna, and such misrepresentation wounded the religious feelings of the Hindoos. He advised them to memorialize government praying that the missionaries should be stopped from interfering in their religious matters and defaming their gods.

MUCH evidence has been discovered that the man who exploded the bomb at Russell Sage's office was Henry L. Norcross, a Boston note-broker. The head has been identified by his parents in Somerville, a suburb of Boston, and by many friends. Norcross's tailor has identified the clothes. But Norcross's dentist finds the dead man's teeth unfilled and not requiring filling, while many of Norcross's teeth had been filled. And some of Norcross's friends declare the head not his. Norcross is described as a Freethinker, a believer in economic reform, an abstainer from liquor and tobacco, honest, and tender to his parents. He had long desired a capitalist to float an elevated railroad plan of his with which he could make a fortune, and anxious pursuit of this end perhaps crazed him. Medical men hav found clear signs of insanity in the bomb-thrower's brain. Russell Sage has published a card thanking those who hav sympathized with him, concluding: "Further, I beg to add that we should increase our faith, our love, our hope, our trust in the God that created us, the God of our salvation. Gratefully, Russell Sage."

WILLING BUT UNABLE.—DOES JESUS WANT TO BE KISSED?

Kiss the Son, lest he be angry, and ye perish from the way, when his wrath is kindled but a little. Blessed are all they that put their trust in him.—Psalms ii, 12.

W. S. BELL'S

Handbook of Freethought

CONTAINING

In condensed and systematized form a vast amount of Evidence Against Christianity.

Selected from the Writings of the Leading American and European Freethinkers and Scientists.

Of his work Mr. Bell says: "I hav aimed in preparing this work to put into compact and orderly form a large amount of irrefragable evidence against the superstitions of the church. I hav often felt the need of such a work for my own use. The matter herewith presented has been culled from some of the ablest writers living and dead. As a book of reference I hope it may be a valuable aid to all investigators and truth-seekers. Its running headlines, chapter heads, subheads, and classified subjects make it a 'handbook.'"

Gems of Thought.

PLEASURE is Nature's test, her sign of approval. When man is happy, he is in harmony with himself and his environment.—Oscar Wilde.

THE whole system of sacrifices in the Old Testament is calculated to harden the heart. The butchery of oxen and lambs, the killing of doves, the perpetual destruction of life, the continual shedding of blood—these things, if they hav any tendency, tend only to harden the heart of childhood.—Robt. G. Ingersoll.

WHEN we coolly examin the opinions of men, we are surprised to find that even in those opinions which they regard as the most essential, nothing is more uncommon than common sense; or, in other words, nothing is more uncommon than a degree of judgment sufficient to discover the most simple truths, or reject the most striking absurdities, and to be shocked with palpable contradictions. —D'Holbach.

How will you treat the impious man, the daring blasphemer, who says to you—See only with my eyes; do not think yourself; I proclaim to you a tyrant God, who ordained me to be your tyrant; I am his well-beloved; he will torment to all eternity millions of his creatures, whom he detests, for the sake of gratifying me; I will be your master in this world, and will laugh at your torments in the next? Do you not feel a very strong inclination to beat this cruel blasphemer.—Voltaire.

PERHAPS I shall be told in the cant-language of the day, as I hav often been told by the Bishop of Llandaff and others, of the great and laudable pains that many pious and learned men hav taken to explain the obscure, and reconcile the contradictory, or, as they say, the seemingly contradictory passages of the Bible. It is because the Bible needs such an undertaking, that is one of the first causes to suspect it is NOT the word of God; this single reflection, when carried home to the mind, is in itself a volume.—Paine.

AMONG the slaves of the Scotch kirk-tyrants the long-continued suppression of all healthier pastimes contributed its share to the increase of intemperance. On the day when the laboring classes found their only chance of leisure, outdoor sports were strictly prohibited. Dancing was considered a heinous, and on the Sabbath almost an unpardonable, sin. The tennis-halls were closed from Saturday night to Monday morning. Bathing was sinful. Mountain excursions, strolls along the beach, or in the open fields, were not permitted on the day of the Lord. Dietetic excesses, however, escaped control, and thus became the general outlet for the cruelly suppressed craving for a diversion from the deadly monotony of drudgery and church-penance. "Nature will hav her revenge." —Professor Felix Oswald in the Bible of Nature.

"THE powers of the heavens shall be shaken" (Matt. xiv, 29). Who are "the powers of the heavens?" Say Jehovah is the principal power: who is to shake him? Is the Son to catch the Father by the nape of the neck and somewhere else, and shake him as a terrier shakes a rat? And, with celestial courtesy, is the Father to reciprocate, and so shake the Son till all his teeth chatter? And then is the Ghost to try his hand at shaking the two of them, and to finish off by knocking their heads together? This is the most rational mode of shaking the powers of heaven that occurs to me. The shaking should hav taken place some eighteen centuries ago; but quite likely it will be all the more terrible when it does take place. The tribes of the earth are to mourn when they see the Son of Man coming in the clouds. Well may they mourn without ceasing if his second coming is to be as prolific as his first has been in hate and bloodshed and ignorance and misery!—Saladin.

THE records of nature hav now been found to reveal an orderly and progressiv system of the development of matter and mind into its present forms, extending through vast ages, proving the Mosaic story of creation to be untrue, and placing it among the myths of earlier days of the human race, which are found to abound in the traditions or literature of all people. This orderly progress of nature reveals an unvarying method, which makes every effect the result of preceding natural causes; and the violations of its methods, called "miracles," are unsupported by sufficient evidence to warrant their belief. Every miracle of which circumstances hav permitted a scientific examination has been disproved, and shown either to be a fraud or to be the result of a law of nature known or fairly supposed. The miracles of our days are now on the eve of solution by the discovery of the laws of psychology and animal magnetism, which many learned men believe will in time solve all that is not fraudulent in the phenomena of Spiritualism. . . . The Christian scheme of theology must therefore take its place in the order of the development of human thought, and in time giv place to the next system which the advancing mind of man evolves; that, in turn, to be improved upon as knowledge of nature and the control of her forces increases. —Robt. C. Adams.
